Than your sire's Islands of the Blest.

Byron.

Isle of Lanterns, an imaginary country, inhabited by pretenders to knowledge, called "Lanternois"—Rabelais, Pantagruel, v. 32, 33 (1545).

head and died—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, ii 35, etc (1470)

Is'rael, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, means England As David was king of Israel, so Charles II was king of England Of his son, the duke of Monmouth, the poet says

Early in foreign fields he won renown
With kings and states allied to Israel's crown
Dryden Absalom and Achitophel l. (1681)

Is'raelites (3 syl), Jewish money-lenders all the Israelites are fit to mob its Next owner for their post-obits.

Byron Don Juan l. 125 (1819)

Is'rafil, the angel who will sound the "Resurrection blast" Then Gabriel and Michael will call together the "dry bones" to judgment When Israfil puts the trumpet to his mouth, the souls of the dead will be cast into the trumpet, and when he blows, out will they fly like hecs, and fill the whole space between earth and heaven Then will they enter their respective bodies, Mahomet leading the way—Sale, Koran (Preliminary discourse, iv)

 Israfil, the angel of melody in paradise It is said that his ravishing songs, accompanied by the daughters of paradise and the clanging of hells, will give delight to the faithful

Is'sachar, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Thomas Thynne of Longleat Hall, a friend to the duke of Monmouth There seems to be a very slight analogy between Thomas Thynne and Issachar son of Jacob If the tribe (compared to an ass overburdened) is alluded to, the poet could hardly have called the rich commoner "wise Issachar"

Mr Thynne and count Koningsmark both wished to marry the widow of Henry Cavendish earl of Ogle Her friends contracted her to the rich commoner, but before the marriage was consummated, he was murdered Three months afterwards, the widow married the duke of Somerset

Hospitable treats did most commend
Wise Issachar his wealthy western friend
Dryden Absalom and Achitophel l. (1681)

Issland, the kingdom of Brunhild—The Nibelungen Lied

Istakhar, in Fars (Persia), upon a rock (The word means "the throne of Jemshid") It is also called "Chil'-Minar," or the forty pillars The Greeks called it Persepolis Istakhar was the cemetery of the Persian kings, and a treasury

Itadach (Colman), surnamed "The Thirsty" In consequence of his rigid observance of the rule of St Patrick, he refused to drink one single drop of water, but his thirst in the harvest-time was so great that it caused his death

Item, a money-broker He was a thorough villain, who could "bully, enjole, curse, fawn, flatter, and filch" Mr Item always advised his clients not to sign away their money, but at the same time stated to them the imperative necessity of so doing "I would advise you strongly not to put your hand to that paper, though Heaven knows how else you can satisfy these duns and escape imprisonment"—Holcroft, The Deserter's Daughter (altered into The Steward)

Ithacan Suitors During the absence of Ulysses king of Ithaca in the Trojan war, his wife Penelopè was pestered by numerous suitors, who assumed that Ulysses, from his long absence, must be dead Penelopè put them off by saying she would finish a certain robe which she was making for Laërtes, her father-in-law, before she gave her final answer to any of them, but at night she undid all the work she had woven during the day At length, Ulysses returned, and relieved her of her perplexity

All the ladies, each at each
Like the Ithacensian suitors in old time
Stared with great eyes and laughed with alien lips.
Tennyson The Princess iv

Ith'oclès (3 syl), in love with Calantha princess of Sparta Ithoclès induces his sister Penthèa to break the matter to the princess, and in time she not only becomes reconciled to his love but also requites it, and her father consents to the marriage During a court festival, Calantha is informed by a messenger that her father has suddenly died, by a second that Penthèa has starved herself to death, and by a third that Ithoclès has been murdered The murderer was Or'gilus, who killed him out of revenge—John Ford, The Broken Heart (1633)

Ithu'riel (4 syl), a cherub sent by Gabriel to find out Satan He finds him squatting like a toad beside Eve as she lay asleep, and brings him before Gabriel

Milton, Paradise Lost, iv 788 (1665)

Ithuriel's Spear, the spear of the angel Ithuriel, whose slightest touch exposed deceit. Hence, when Satan squatted like a toad "close to the ear of Eve," Ithuriel only touched the creature with his spear, and it resumed the form of Satan.

for no falsehood can endure
Touch of celestial temper but returns
Of force to its own likeness
Milton Paradise Lost iv (1665)

Ithuriel, the guardian angel of Judas Iscariot. After Satan entered into the heart of the traitor, Ithuriel was given to Simon Peter as his second angel—Klopstock, The Messiah, iii and iv (1748, 1771).

Ivan the Terrible, Ivan IV of Russia, a man of great energy, but infamous for his cruelties. It was he who first adopted the title of czar (1529, 1533-1581).

Ivanhoe (3 syl), a novel by Sir W. Scott (1820). The most brilliant and splendid of romances in any language. Rebecca, the Jewess, was Scott's favourite character. The scene is laid in England in the reign of Richard I, and we are introduced to Robin Hood in Sherwood Forest, banquets in Saxon halls, tournaments, and all the pomp of ancient chivalry. Rowena, the heroine, is quite thrown into the shade by the gentle, meek, yet high-souled Rebecca.

Ivanhoe (Sir Wilfred of), the favourite of Richard I, and the disinherited son of Cedric of Rotherwood. Disguised as a palmer, he goes to Rotherwood, and meets there Rowena his father's ward, with whom he falls in love, but we hear little more of him except as the friend of Rebecca and her father Isaac of York, to both of whom he shows repeated acts of kindness, and completely wins the affections of the beautiful Jewess. In the grand tournament, Ivanhoe [I can ho] appears as the "Desdichado" or the "Disinherited Knight," and overthrows all comers. King Richard pleads for him to Cedric, reconciles the father to his son, and the young knight marries Rowena—Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I).

Ivanovitch (son of Ivan or John), the popular name of a Russian. Similar in construction to our "John-son," the Danish "Jan-sen," and the Scotch "Mac-na."

 The popular name of the English as a people is John Bull, of the Germans, Cousin Michael, of the French, Jean Crapaud, of the Chinese, John Chinaman, of the North American States, Brother Jonathan, of the Welsh, Taffy, of the Scotch, Sandy, of the Swiss, Colin Tampon, of the Russians, Ivan, etc.

Iverach (Allan), or steward of Invereschallock with Gallruth, at the Clehan of Aberfoyle—Sir W. Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I).

Ives (St), originally called Siepe. Its name was changed in honour of St Ives, a Persian missionary.

From Persia led by zeal St Ives this island sought,
And near our ears ere thus a fit place finding taught

Ivory Gate of Dreams. Dreams which delude pass through the ivory gate, but those which come true through the horn gate. Thus when depends upon two puns. Ivory, in Greek, is elephas, and the verb elephanō means "to cheat," horn, in Greek, is leōs, and the verb leōanō means "to accomplish."

Sunt geminae mundi portae quarum altera fertur
Cornu, qua veritas ille datur et us umbrata,
Alteri candentis pe ferat nileus elei hanto
Sed falsa ad eum militat in nula Manes
Virgil Aeneid vi. 599-6

From gate of horn or ivory dreams are sent
The one to deceive, and those for warning meant.

Ivory Shoulder. Demeter ate the shoulder of Pelops, served up by Tantalo, so when the gods restored the body to life, Demeter supplied the lacking shoulder by one made of ivory.

Pylgryngoras had a golden thigh, which he showed to Ab'aris the Hyperborean priest.

Nat Pelops' shoul'er whiter than her hands,
Nor snowy swans that jet on Ixion's sands.

Ivory Tube of prince Ali, a sort of telescope, which showed the person who looked through it whatever he wished most to see—Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Pari-Banou").

Ivry, in France, famous for the battle won by Henry of Navarre over the League (1590).

Hurrah! hurrah! a single field
Hath turned the chance of war
Hurrah! hurrah! for Ivry,
And Henry of Navarre

Lord Stanbury, Lays (1777, 1847)

Ivy Lane, London, so called from the houses of the prebendaries of St Paul, overgrown with ivy, which once stood there.

I'wein, a knight of the Round Table. He slays the possessor of an enchanted fountain, and marries the widow, whose name is Landine. Gaw'ern or Gawain urges him to new exploits, so he quits his wife for a year in quest of adventures, and as he does not return at the stated time, Landine loses all love for him. On his return, he goes mad, and wanders in the woods, where he is cured by three sorcerers. He now helps a lion fighting against a dragon, and the lion becomes his faithful companion. He goes to the enchanted fountain, and there finds Lunet prisoner. While struggling with the enchanted fountain, Lunet aids him with her ring, and he in turn saves her life. By the help of his lion, Iwein kills several giants, delivers three hundred virgins, and, on his return to King Arthur's court, marries Lunet.—Hartmann von der Aue (thirteenth century).

Ixi'on, king of the Lap'ithæ, attempted to win the love of Hère (Juno), but Zeus substituted a cloud for the goddess, and a centaur was born.

* * R. Browning calls the name incorrectly Ixi'on, as

Jays prove cloudlets

Men are the merest Ixi'ons.

Robert Browning Dramatic Lyrics (The Globe.)

Jaaser, who carried the sacred banner of the prophet at the battle of Mnta. When one hand was lopped off, he clutched the banner with the other, this hand being also lost, he held it with his two stumps. When, at length, his head was cleft from his body, he contrived so to fall as to detain the banner till it was seized by Abdallah, and handed to Khalid.

CYRÆGIROS, in the battle of Mar'athon, seized one of the Persian ships with his right hand. When this was lopped off, he laid hold of it with his left, and when this was also cut off, he seized it with his teeth, and held on till he lost his head.

ADMIRAL BENVOW, in an engagement with the French near St. Martha, in 1701, was carried on deck on a wooden frame after both his legs and thighs were shivered into splinters by chain-shot.

ALMEYDA, the Portuguese governor of India, had himself propped against the mainmast after both his legs were shot off.

The cook, who was no less dexterous than Dame Jacinta, was assisted by the coachman in dressing the victuals.—Lesage, Gil Blas III. 10 (1715).

Jacin'tha, the supposed wife of Octavio, and formerly contracted to don Henrique (2 syl.) an uxorious Spanish nobleman.—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Spanish Curate (1622).

Jacin'tha, the wealthy ward of Mr. Strickland, in love with Bellamy. Jacintha is staid but resolute, and though "she elopes down a ladder of ropes" in boy's costume, has plenty of good sense and female modesty.—Dr. Hoadly, The Suspicious Husband (1747).

Jack (Colonel), the hero of Defoe's novel entitled The History of the Most Remarkable Life and Extraordinary Adventures of the truly Hon. Colonel Jaque, vulgarly called Colonel Jack. The colonel (born a gentleman and bred a pick-pocket) goes to Virginia, and passes through all the stages of colonial life, from that of "slave" to that of an owner of slaves and plantations.

The transition from their refined Orondates and Statius to the society of captain [sic] Jack and Moll Flanders is (to use a phrase of Sterne) like turning from Alexander the Great to Alexander the cooper-smith.—Encyc. Brit. Art. Romance.

Jack Amend-all, a nickname given to Jack Cade the rebel, who promised to remedy all abuses (*-1450). As a specimen of his reforms, take the following examples—

I your captain am brave and vow reformation. There shall be in England seven half penny loaves sold for a penny, the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops, and I will make it felony to drink small beer. When I am king there shall be no money, all shall eat and drink on my score, and I will apparel all in one livery.—Shakespeare 2 Henry VI act iv. sc. 2 (1591).

They did not go for fame or wealth
But went at duty's call
And tho' united in their aim,
Were severed in their fall.

Jack and the Bean-Stalk. Jack was a very poor lad, sent by his mother to sell a cow, which he parted with to a butcher for a few beans. His mother, in her rage, threw the beans away, but one of them grew during the night as high as the heavens. Jack climbed the stalk, and, by the direction of a fairy, came to a giant's castle, where he begged food and rest. This he did thrice, and in his three visits stole the giant's red hen which laid golden eggs, his money-bags, and his harp. As he ran off with the last treasure, the harp cried out, "Master! master!" which woke the giant, who ran after Jack, but the nimble lad cut the bean-stalk with an axe, and the giant was killed in his fall.

* * This is said to be an allegory of the Teutonic Al-fader the "red hen" representing the all-producing sun, the "money-bags" the fertilizing rain, and the "harp" the winds.

Jack-in-the-Green, one of the May-day mummers

* * Dr Owen Pugh says that Jack-in-the-Green represents Melvas king of Somersetshire, disguised in green boughs and lying in ambush for queen Guenever the wife of King Arthur, as she was returning from a hunting expedition.

Jack-o'-Lent, a kind of aunt Sally set up during Lent to be pitched at, hence a puppet, a sheepish booby, a boy-page, a scarecrow. Mrs Page says to Robin, Falstaff's page

You'll be Jack a Lent have you been true to us—
Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor act. iii. sc. 2

Jack the Giant-Killer, a series of nursery tales to show the mastery of skill and wit over brute strength. Jack encounters various giants, but outwits them all. The following would illustrate the sort of combat. Suppose they came to a thick iron door, the giant would belabour it with his club hour after hour without effect, but Jack would apply a delicate key, and the door would open at once. This is not one of the stories, but will serve to illustrate the sundry contests. Jack was a "valiant Cornishman," and his first exploit was to kill the giant Cormoran, by digging a deep pit which he filled over with grass, etc. The giant fell into the pit, and Jack knocked him on the head with a hatchet. Jack afterwards obtained a coat of invisibility, a cap of knowledge, a resistless sword, and shoes of swiftness, and, thus armed, he almost rid Wales of its giants.

Our Jack the Giant Killer is clearly the last modern transmutation of the old British legend told by Geoffrey of Monmouth, of Corineus the Trojan, the companion of the Trojan Brutus when he first settled in Britain.—Masson.

Jack-with-a-Lantern. This meteoric phenomenon, when seen on the ground or a little above it, is called by sundry names, as Brenning-drake, Burning candle, Corpse candles, Dank Will, Death-fires, Dick-a-Tuesday, Elf-fire, the Fair maid of Ireland, Friars lantern, Gillion-a-burnt-tail, Gyl Burnt-tail, Ignis fatuus, Jack-o'-lantern, Jack-with-a-lantern, Kit-o'-the-canstick, Kitty-wi'-a-wisp, Mad Crisp, Peg-a-lantern, Puck, Polun Goodfellow, Shot stars, Spittle of the stars, Star jelly, a Sylham lamp, a Walking fire, Wandering fires, Wandering wild-fire, Will-with-a-wisp.

Jaffier, a young man befriended by Priuli, a proud Venetian senator Jaffier rescued the senator's daughter Belvidera from shipwreck, and afterwards married her clandestinely The old man now discarded both, and Pierre induced Jaffier to join a junto for the murder of the senators Jaffier revealed the conspiracy to his wife, and Belvidera, in order to save her father, induced her husband to disclose it to Priuli, under promise of free pardon to the conspirators The pardon, however, was limited to Jaffier, and the rest were ordered to torture and death Jaffier now sought out his friend Pierre, and, as he was led to execution, stabbed him to prevent his being broken on the wheel, and then killed himself Belvidera went mad and died —F Otway, Venice Preserved (1682)

T Betterton (1635-1710), Robert Wilks (1670-1732), Spranger Barry (1719-1777), C M Young (1777-1856), and W C Macready (1793-1873), are celebrated for this character

Jaga-naut, the seven-headed idol of the Hindûs, described by Southey in the Curse of Kehama, xiv (1809)

Jaggers, a lawyer of Little Britain, London He was a burly man, of an exceedingly dark complexion, with a large head and large hand He had bushy black eyebrows that stood up bristling, sharp suspicious eyes set very deep in his head, and strong black dots where his beard and whiskers would have been if he had let them. His hands smelt strongly of scented soap, he wore a very large watch-chain, was in the constant habit of biting his fore-finger, and when he spoke to any one, he threw his fore-finger at him pointedly. A hard, logical man was Mr Jaggars, who required an answer to be "yes" or "no," allowed no one to express an opinion, but only to state facts in the fewest possible words. Magwitch appointed him Pip's guardian, and he was Miss Havisham's man of business.—C Dickens, Great Expectations (1860)

Jarn'dyce v Jarn'dyce (2 syl), a Chancery suit "never ending, still beginning," which had dragged its slow length along over so many years that it had blighted the prospects and ruined the health of all persons interested in its settlement—C Dickens, Bleak House (1853)

Jarn'dyce (Mr), client in the great Chancery suit of "Jarn'dyce v Jarn'dyce," and guardian of Esther Summerson He concealed the tenderest heart under a flimsy churlishness of demeanour, and could never endure to be thanked for any of his numberless acts of kindness and charity If anything went wrong with him, or his heart was moved to elting, he would say, "I am sure the wind is in the east"—C Dickens, Bleak House (1853)

Jarvie (Bailie Nicol), a magistrate at Glasgow, and kinsman of Rob Roy He is petulant, conceited, purse-proud, without tact, and intensely prejudiced, but kind-hearted and sincere Jarvie marries his maid The novel of Rob Roy has been dramatized by J Pocock, and Charles Mackay was the first to appear in the character of "Bailie Nicol Jarvie" Talfourd says (1829) "Other actors are sophisticate, but Mackay is the thing itself"—Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

The character of Bailie Nicol Jarvie is one of the author's happiest conceptions and the idea of carrying him to the wild rugged mountains, among outlaws and desperadoes—at the same time that he retained a keen relish of the comforts of the Saltmarket of Glasgow and a due sense of his dignity as a magister—complete the ludicrous effect of the picture.—Chambers, English Literature ii 257

Jarvis, a faithful old servant, who tries to save his master, Beverley, from his fatal passion of gambling—Edward Moore, The Gamester (1753)

Jaspar was poor, heartless, and wicked, he lived by highway robbery, and robbery led to murder One day, he induced a poor neighbour to waylay his landlord, but the neighbour relented, and said, "Though dark the night, there is One above who sees in darkness" "Never fear!" said Jaspar, "for no eye above or below can pierce this darkness" As he spoke, an unnatural light gleamed on him, and he became a confirmed maniac—R Southey, Jaspar (a ballad)

Jasper (Old), a ploughman at Gleadearg Lower—Sir W Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth)

Jasper (Sir), father of Charlotte He wants her to marry a Mr Dapper, but she loves Leander, and, to avoid a marriage she dislikes, pretends to be dumb A mock doctor is called in, who discovers the facts of the case, and employs Leander as his apothecary Leander soon cures the lady with "pills matrimoniales" In Molière's Le Médecin Malgré Lui (from which this play is taken), sir Jasper is called "Geronte" (2 syl)—H Fielding, The Mock Doctor

Jasper Packlemerton, of atrocious memory, one of the chief figures in Mrs Jarley's wax-work exhibition

Jasper courted and married fourteen wives and destroyed them all by tickling the soles of their feet when they were asleep On being brought to the scaffold and asked if he was repented he said Mrs Jarley replied he let this adies to be particular in the character of the gentleman of their class. On one his fingers are curled as if in the act of ticking, and there is a wrink in his eye."—C. Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop, xxvii, (1849).

Jaup (Alison), an old woman at Middlemas village—Sir W Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Jaup (Saunders), a farmer at Old St Ronau's—Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Javan lost his father on the day of his birth, and was brought up in the "patriarch's glen" by his mother, till she also died. He then sojourned for ten years with the race of Cain, and became the disciple of Jubal the great musician. He then returned to the glen, and fell in love with Zillah, but the glen being invaded by giants, Zillah and Javan, with many others, were taken captives. Lnoch reproved the giants, and, as he ascended up to heaven, his mantle fell on Javan, who released the captives, and conducted them back to the glen. The giants were panic-struck by a tempest, and their king was killed by some unknown hand—James Montgomery, The World before the Flood (1812)

Ja'van's Issue, the Ionians and Greeks generally (Gen x 2) Milton uses the expression in Paradise Lost, i 508

* In Isaiah lxi 19, and in Ezek xxvii 13, the word is used for Greeks collectively

Javert, an officer of police, the impersonation of inexorable law—Victor Hugo, Les Misérables

Ja'zer, a city of Gad, personified by Isaiah "Moab shall howl for Moab, every one shall howl. I will bewail, with the weeping of Jazer, the vine of Sibmah, I will water thee with my tears, O Heshbon"—Isaiah xvi 7-9

It did not content the congregation to weep all of them, but they howled with a loud voice weeping with the weeping of Jazer—Kirkton 140

Jealous Traffick (Sir), a rich merchant, who fancies everything Spanish is better than English, and intends his daughter Isabinda to marry don Diego Barbinetto, who is expected to arrive forthwith. Isabinda is in love with Charles [Gripe], who dresses in a Spanish costume, passes himself off as don Diego Barbinetto, and is married to Isabinda. Sir Jealous is irritable, headstrong, prejudiced, and wise in his own conceit—Mrs Centlivre, The Busy Body (1709)

Jealous Wife (The), a comedy by George Colman (1761) Harriot Russel marries Mr Oakly, and becomes "the jealous wife," but is ultimately cured by the interposition of major Oakly, her brother-in-law.

* This comedy is founded on Fielding's Tom Jones

Jeames de la Pluche, a flunky. Jeames means the same thing—Thackeray, Jeames's Diary (1849)

Jean des Vignes, a drunken performer of marionettes. The French say, Il fait comme Jean des Vignes (i.e. "he is a good-for-nothing fellow"), Le mariage de Jean des Vignes (i.e. "a hedge marriage"), Un Jean des Vignes (i.e. "an ungainly fellow"), Plus sot que Jean des Vignes (i.e. "worse than come out"), etc

Jean! que dire sur Jean! C'est un terrible nom

Qui jamais n'accompagne une épithète honnête.

Jean des Vignes Jean ligne. Où rais-je? Trouvez bon

Qu'en si beau chemin je m'arrête.

Virgil Trucasté (Junio to Enecas") vii.

Jean Folle Farine, a merry Andrew, a poor fool, a Tom Noodle. So called because he comes on the stage like a great loutish boy, dressed all in white, with his face, hair, and hands thickly covered with flour. Scaramouch is a sort of Jean Folle Farine

Ouida has a novel called Folle Farine, but she uses the phrase in quite another sense

Jean Jacques So J J Rousseau is often called (1712-1778)

That is almost the only maxim of Jean Jacques to which I can subscribe—Lord Lytton

Jean Paul. J P Friedrich Richter is generally so called (1763-1825)

Jeanne of Alsace, a girl ruined by Dubosc the highway man. She gives him up to justice, in order to do a good turn to Julie Lesnques (2 syl), who had befriended her—E Stirling, The Courier of Lyons (1852)

Jedburgh, Jeddart, or Jedwood Justice, hang first and try afterwards. The custom rose from the summary way of dealing with border marauders

* Jeddart and Jedwood are merely corruptions of Jedburgh

Cupar Justice is the same thing.

Abingdon Law, the same as "Jedburgh Justice". In the Commonwealth, major-general Brown, of Abingdon, first hanged his prisoners and then tried them

Lynch Law, mob law. So called from James Lynch of Piedmont, in Virginia

It is a summary way of dealing with marauders, etc. Called in Scotland, Burlaw or Byrlaw Jeddler (Dr), "a great philosopher" The heart and mystery of his philosophy was to look upon the world as a gigantic practical joke, something too absurd to be considered seriously by any rational man. A kind and generous man by nature was Dr Jeddler, and though he had taught himself the art of turning good to dross and sunshine into shade, he had not taught himself to forget his warm benevolence and active love. He wore a pigtail, and had a streaked face like a winter pippin, with here and there a dimple "to express the peckings of the birds," but the pippin was a tempting apple, a rosy, healthy apple after all.

Grace and Marion Jeddler, daughters of the doctor, beautiful, graceful, and affectionate. They both fell in love with Alfred Heathfield, but Alfred loved the younger daughter. Marion, knowing the love of Grace, left her home clandestinely one Christmas Day, and all supposed she had eloped with Michael Warden. In due time, Alfred married Grace, and then Marion made it known to her sister that she had given up Alfred out of love to her, and had been living in concealment with her aunt Martha. Report says she subsequently married Michael Warden, and became the pride and honour of his country mansion.—C. Dickens, The Battle of Life (1846)

Jed'ida and Benjamin, two of the children that Jesus took into His arms and blessed

"Well I remember" said Benjamin "when we were on earth with what loving fondness He folded us in His arms. How tenderly He pressed us to His heart. A tear was on His cheek and I kissed it away. I see it still, and shall ever see it." And I too answered Jedida, remember when His arms were clasped around me how He said to our mothers "Unless ye become as little children ye cannot enter the Kingdom of heaven."—Hilopstock The Messiah I. (1743)

Jehoi'achim, the servant of Joshua Geddes the quaker.—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.)

Je'hu, a coachman, one who drives at a rattling pace

The driving is like the driving of Jehu the son of Ninihi for he driveth furiously.—2 Kings ix 20

Jehu (Companions of) The "Chonans" were so called, from a fanciful analogy between their self-imposed task and that appointed to Jehu on his being set over the kingdom of Israel. As Jehu was to cut off Ahab and Jezebel, with all their house, so the Chonans were to cut off

Louis XVI, Marie Antoinette, and all the Bourbons

Jellicot (Old Goody), servant at the under-keeper's hut, Woodstock Forest.—Sir W. Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Jellyby (Mrs), a sham philanthropist, who spends her time, money, and energy on foreign missions, to the neglect of her family and home duties. Untidy in dress, living in a perfect litter, she has a habit of looking "a long way off," as if she could see nothing nearer to her than Africa. Mrs Jellyby is quite overwhelmed with business correspondence relative to the affairs of Borrioboola Gha.—C. Dickens, Bleak House, iv (1852)

Jemlikha, the favourite Greek slave of Dakianos of Ephesus. Nature had endowed him with every charm, "his words were sweeter than the honey of Arabia, and his wit sparkled like a diamond." One day, Dakianos was greatly annoyed by a fly, which persisted in tormenting the king, whereupon Jemlikha said to himself, "If Dakianos cannot rule a fly, how can he be the creator of heaven and earth?" This doubt he communicated to his fellow-slaves, and they all resolved to quit Ephesus, and seek some power superior to that of the arrogant of divine honours.—Comte Caylus, Oriental Tales ("Dakianos and the Seven Sleepers," 1713)

Jemmie Duffs, weepers (See JAMIE DUFFS)

Jemmies, sheep's heads, and also a house-breaker's instrument

Mr Elkes made many pleasant witticisms on Jemmies, "a cant name for sheep's heads and also for an ingenious implement much used in his profession."—C. Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Jemmy This name, found on engravings of the eighteenth century, means James Worsdale (died 1767)

Jemmy Twitcher, a cunning and treacherous highwayman.—Gay, The Beggar's Opera (1727)

* * Lord Sandwich, member of the Kit-Kat Club, was called "Jemmy Twitcher" (1765)

Jenkin, the servant of George-a-Green. He says a fellow ordered him to hold his horse, and see that it took no cold. "No, no," quoth Jenkin, "I'll lay my cloak under him." He did so, but "mark you," he adds, "I cut four holes in my cloak first, and made his horse stand on the bare ground"—Robert Greene, George-a-Green, the Tinner of Walsfield (1584)

Jenkin, one of the retainers of Julian Avenel (2 s 1) of Avenel Castle—Sir W. Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth)

Jenkins (Mrs Winifred), Miss Tabitha Bramble's maid, noted for her odd spelling, misapplication of words, and ludicrous misnomers. Mrs Winifred Jenkins is the original of Mrs Malaprop—Smollett, The Expedition of Humphrey Clinker (1771)

Jenkins, a vulgar lick-spittle of the aristocracy, who relates their prides and witticisms, records their movements and deeds, gives flaming accounts of their dresses and parties either read or in newspaper paragraphs. "Lord and lady Dash attended divine service last Sunday, and were very attentive to the sermon" (wonderful!) "Lord and lady Dash took a drive or walk last Monday in their magnificent park of Snobloodleham. Lady Dash wore a mantle of rich silk, a bonnet rich as rich fustians, and shoes with roses." The name is said to have been given by Punch to a writer in the Morning Post.

Jenkinson (Ffraw), a green old errandier, whom Dr Primrose met in a public tavern. Imposed on by his venerable appearance, apparent decency, learned talk about 'cosmogony,' and still more so by his flattery of the doctor's work on the subject of monograms, Dr Primrose sold the swindler his horse, Old Blackberry, for a draft upon Farnham-borough. When the draft was presented for payment, the farmer told the vicar that Iphraim Jenkinson "was the greatest rascal under heaven" and that he was the very rogue who had sold Moses Primrose the spectacles. Subsequently the vicar found him in the county jail, where he showed the vicar great kindness, did him valuable service, became a reformed character and probably married one of the daughters of Farmer Farnborough—Goldsmith, Vicar of Wakefield (1765)

For our own part, we may as well let the poor creature be able to treat with one party as a party to the learned speech. A man who can do this is a man from the bottom of the sea. I wish the learned creature of Jenkinson—Ffraw—Ffraw. Art. Lomax.

Jennie, housekeeper to the old lord of Dumbiedies—Sir W. Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.).

Jenny [Dr. r.] Captain Machenath says, "What, my pretty Jenny! as prim and demure as ever? Her face is a pride, though ever so much laid, but a more sanctified look with a more ambitious heart." She pretends to be a Machenath, but craftily secures one of his pupils. But his other "pals" may have a ready betrayal into the hands of the constables (act II.)—I. Gray, The Doctor's Daughter (1727)

Jenny l'Ouvriere, the type of a hard-working Parisian millow-woman. She is contrasted with a few rascals—flowers which she turns "her garden" a capital and which she calls "her money," and when she gives the fragments of her food to some one poorer than herself, she calls it "her delight."

Jeph'thah's Daughter. When Jeph'thah went forth against the Ammonites, he vowed that if he returned victorious he would sacrifice, as a burnt offering, whatever first met him on his entrance into his native city. He gained a splendid victory, and at the next thereof his only daughter came forth dancing to give him welcome. The miserable father rent his clothes in grief, but the noble spirited maiden would not hear of his violating the vow. She demanded a short respite, to bewail upon the mountains her blighted hope of becoming a mother, and then subjoined to her father—Judges xi.

An almost identical tale is told of Idomeneus king of Crete. On his return from the Trojan war, he made a vow as a tempest that, if he escaped, he would offer to Neptune the first living creature that presented itself to his eye on the Cretan shore. His own son was then to welcome him in honor, and Idomeneus offered him up a sacrificial fire, and accordingly to his son. Euripides has introduced this legend in his Idomeneus.

Agamemnon vowed to Athena, if he might be victorious, that he would sacrifice to her the daughter of all his possessions. Iphigenia his infant daughter, was, of course, his "dearest possession," but he refused to sacrifice her, and thus incurred the wrath of the goddess, which resulted in the detention of the Trojan fleet at Aulis. Iphigenia being offered as sacrifice, the offended deity was satisfied.

and interposed at the critical moment, by carrying the princess to Tauris and substituting a stag in her stead

The latter part of this tale cannot fail to call to mind the offering of Abraham As he was about to take the life of Isaac, Jehovah interposed, and a ram was substituted for the human victim — Gen 22:13

[He] not bent as Jephthah once
Blindly to execute a rash resolve
Whom better it had suited to exclaim
I have done ill I than to redeem his pledge
By doing worse Not unlike to him
In folly that great leader of the Greeks—
Whereon the altar Iphigenia mourned
Her virgin beauty

Dante's Paradise v (1311)

* * Iphigēnia, in Greek Ἰφιγένεια, is accented incorrectly in this translation by Cary

* * Jephthah's daughter has often been dramatized Thus we have in English Jephthah's Daughter, by Plessie Morney, Jephthah (1546), by Christopherson, Jephthah, by Buchanan, and Jephthah (an opera, 1752), by Handel

Jerningham (Master Thomas), the duke of Buckingham's gentleman — Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Jerome (Don), father of don Ferdinand and Louisa, pig-headed, passionate, and mercenary, but very fond of his daughter He insists on her marrying Isaac Mendoza, a rich Portuguese Jew, but Louisa, being in love with don Antonio, positively refuses to do so She is turned out of the house by mistake, and her duenna is locked up, under the belief that she is Louisa Isaac, being introduced to the duenna, elopes with her, supposing her to be don Jerome's daughter, and Louisa, taking refuge in a convent, gets married to don Antonio Ferdinand, at the same time, marries Clara the daughter of don Guzman The old man is well content, and promises to be the friend of his children, who, he acknowledges, have chosen better for themselves than he had done for them — Sheridan, The Duenna (1775)

Jerome (Father), abbot at St Bride's Convent — Sir W Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I)

Jeron'imo, the principal character in The Spanish Tragedy, by Thomas Kyd (1597) On finding his application to the king ill-timed, he says to himself, "Go by! Jeronimo," which so tickled the fancy of the audience that it became a common street jest

Jerry, manager of a troupe of dancing dogs He was a tall, black-whiskered man, in a velvet coat — O Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop, 2000 (1840)

Jerry Sneak, a hen-pecked husband — Loote, Mayor of Garratt (1768)

Jerryman'dering, so dividing a state or local district as to give one part of it a political advantage over the other The word is a corruption of "Gerryman'dering," so called from Elbridge Gerry, governor of Massachusetts, member of congress from 1776 to 1784, and vice-president of the United States in 1812 Elbridge Gerry died in 1814

Jeru'salem, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, means London, "David" is Charles II, and "Absalom" the duke of Monmouth, etc

Jerusalem Henry IV was told "he should not die but in Jerusalem" Being in Westminster Abbey, he inquired what the chapter-house was called, and when he was told it was called the "Jerusalem Chamber," he felt sure that he would die there "according to the prophecy," and so he did

Pope SILVESTER II was told the same thing, and died as he was saying mass in a church so called at Rome — Brown, Isaaculus

CAMBYSES, son of Cyrus, was told that he should die in Ecbat'ana, which he supposed meant the capital of Media, but he died of his wounds in a place so called in Syria

Jerusalem Delivered, an epic

poem in twenty books, by Torquato Tasso (1575)

The crusaders, having encamped on the plains of Tortosa, choose Godfrey for their chief. The overtures of Argantes being declined, war is declared by him in the name of the king of Egypt. The Christian army reaches Jerusalem, but it is found that the city cannot be taken without the aid of Rinaldo, who had withdrawn from the army because Godfrey had cited him for the death of Gernando, whom he had slain in a duel. Godfrey sends to the enchanted island of Armida to invite the hero back, and on his return Jerusalem is assailed in a night attack. The poem concludes with the triumphant entry of the Christians into the Holy City, and their adoration at the Redeemer's tomb.

The two chief episodes are the loves of Orlando and Sophronia, and of Tancred and Corinda.

Jervis (Mrs), the virtuous house-keeper of young squire B. Mrs Jervis protects Pam'ela when her young master assails her—Richardson, Pamela or Virtue Rewarded (1740)

Jessamy, the son of colonel Oldboy. He changed his name in compliment to lord Jessamy, who adopted him and left him his heir. Jessamy is an affected, conceited prig, who dresses as a fop, carries a muff to keep his hands warm, and likes old china better than a pretty girl. This popinjay proposes to Clarissa Flowerdale, but she despises him, much to his indignation and astonishment—Bickerstaff, Lionel and Clarissa (1735-1790)

He's a cormorant a fop a dainty milk-sop
Who essenced and dizen'd from bottom to top
And looked like a doll from a milliner's shop
He shrugs and takes snuff and carries a muff
A minckle snickling French powdered puff

Jessamy Bride (The), Mary Horne, with whom Goldsmith fell in love in 1769

Jessica, daughter of Shylock the Jew. She elopes with Lorenzo—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice (1597)

Jessica cannot be called a sketch or if a sketch she is dashed off in glowing colours from the rainbow palette of a Titian. She has a rich tint of Orientalism shed over her—Mrs. Jameson.

Jesters (See Fools)

Jests (The Father of), Joseph or Joe Miller, an English comic actor, whose name has become a household word for a stale joke (1684-1738). The book of jestes which goes by his name was compiled by Mr Mottley the dramatist (1739). Joe Miller himself never uttered a jest in his life, and it is a lucus a non lucendo to father them on such a taciturn, commonplace dullard.

Jesus Christ and the Clay Bird. The Korân says "O Jesus, son of Mary, remember when thou didst create of clay the figure of a bird and did breathe thereon, and it became a bird"—Ch. v.

The allusion is to a legend that Jesus was playing with other children who amused themselves with making clay birds, but when the child Jesus breathed on the one He had made, it instantly received life and flew away—Hone, Apocryphal New Testament (1820).

Jew (The), a comedy by R. Cumberland (1776), written to disabuse the public mind of unjust prejudices against a people who have been long "scattered and peeled." The Jew is Sheva, who was rescued at Cadiz from an auto da fe by don Carlos, and from a howling London mob by the son of don Carlos, called Charles Ratcliffe. His whole life is spent in unostentatious benevolence, but his modesty is equal to his philanthropy. He gives £10,000 as a marriage portion to Ratcliffe's sister, who marries Frederick Bertram, and he makes Charles the heir of all his property.

Jew (The).

This is the Jew
That Shakespeare drew

This couplet was written by Pope, and refers to the "Shylock" of Charles Macklin (1690-1797).

Jew (The Wandering)

1 Of Greek tradition. ARISTEAS, a poet, who continued to appear and disappear alternately for above 400 years, and who visited all the mythical nations of the earth.

2 Of Jewish story. Tradition says that CARTHAPHILOS, the door-keeper of the judgment hall in the service of Pontius Pilate, struck our Lord as he led Him forth, saying, "Get on! Faster, Jesus!" Whereupon the Man of Sorrows replied, "I am going, but tarry thou till I come [again]." This man afterwards became a Christian, and was baptized by Ananias under the name of Joseph. Every hundred years he falls into a trance, out of which he rises again at the age of 30.

* * The earliest account of the Wandering Jew is in the Book of the Chronicles.

of the Abbey of St Alban's, copied and continued by Matthew Paris (1228) In 1242 Philip Mouskes, afterwards bishop of Tournay, wrote the "rhymed chronicle"

Another legend is that Jesus, pressed down by the weight of His cross, stopped to rest at the door of a cobbler, named AHASUE'RUS, who pushed Him away, saying, "Get off! Away with you! away!" Our Lord replied, "Truly, I go away, and that quickly, but tarry thou till I come"

* * This is the legend given by Paul von Eitzen, bishop of Schleswig, in 1547—Greve, Memoirs of Paul von Eitzen (1744)

A third legend says that it was the cobbler Ahasue'rus who haled Jesus to the judgment seat, and that as the Man of Sorrows stayed to rest awhile on a stone, he pushed Him, saying, "Get on, Jesus! Here you shall not stay!" Jesus replied, "I truly go away, and go to rest, but thou shalt go away and never rest till I come"

3 In German legend, the Wandering Jew is associated with JOHN BUTTADÆUS, seen at Antwerp in the thirteenth century, again in the fifteenth, and again in the sixteenth centuries His last appearance was in 1774, at Brussels

* * Leonard Doldius, of Nurnberg, in his Praxis Alchymie (1604), says that the Jew Ahasue'rus is sometimes called "Buttadeus"

Signor GUARDI, who had been dead 180 years, appeared in the latter half of the eighteenth century, and had his likeness taken by Titian One day he disappeared as mysteriously as he had come—Turkish Spy, ii (1682)

4 The French legend The French call the Wandering Jew ISAAQ LAKE'DION or Laquedem—Mitternacht, Dissertation in Johan, xxi 19

5 Of Dr Croly's novel The name given to the Wandering Jew by Dr Croly is SALATHIEL BEN SADI, who appeared and disappeared towards the close of the sixteenth century at Venice, in so sudden a manner as to attract the attention of all Europe

* * Dr Croly, in his novel called Salathiel (1827), traces the course of the Wandering Jew, so does Eugène Sue, in Le Jusf Errant (1845), but in these novels the Jew makes no figure of importance

G Doré, in 1861, illustrated the legend of the Wandering Jew in folio wood engravings

6 It is said in legend that GIRSIFS are doomed to be everlasting wanderers, because they refused the Virgin and Child hospitality in their flight into Egypt—Arctinus, Annatum Boiorum, libri septem, vii (1554)

The legend of the Wild Huntsman, called by Shakespeare "Herne the Hunter," and by Father Mattheu "St Hubert," is said to be a Jew who would not suffer Jesus to drink from a horse-trough, but pointed out to Him some water in a hoof-print, and made Him go there and drink—Kuhn von Schwarz, Nordd Sagen, 499

Jews (The), in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, means those English who were loyal to Charles II called "David" in the satire (1681-2)

Jewkes (Mrs), a detestable character in Richardson's Pamela (1710)

Jez'ebel (A Painted), a flaunting woman, of brazen face but loose morals So called from Jezebel, the wife of Ahab king of Israel

Jim, the boy of Reginald Lowestoffe the young Templar—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Jim Crow, the name of a popular comic nigger song, brought out in 1836 at the Adelphi Theatre, and popularized by T D Rice The burden of the song is

Wheel about and turn about and do just so
And every time you wheel about, jump Jim Crow

Jim Vin, i.e. Jenkin Vincent, one of Ramsay's apprentices, in love with Margaret Ramsay—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Jim'gle (Alfred), a strolling actor, who, by his powers of amusing and sharp-wittedness, imposes for a time on the members of the Pickwick Club, and is admitted to their intimacy, but being found to be an impostor, he is dropped by them The generosity of Mr Pickwick in rescuing Jingle from the Fleet, reclaims him, and he quits England Alfred Jingle talks most rapidly and slipshodly, but not without much native shrewdness, and he knows a "hawk from a hand-saw"—C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Jingo, a corruption of Janko, the Basque Supreme Being "By Jingo!" or "By the living Jingo!" is an appeal to deity Edward I had Basque mountaineers conveyed to England to take part in his Welsh wars, and the Plantagenets hold the Basque provinces in possession. This Basque oath is a landmark of these facts.

Jingoes (The), the anti-Russians in the war between Russia and Turkey, hence the English war party. The term arose (1878) from M'Dermott's War-song, beginning thus

We don't want to fight, but by Jingo if we do
We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money too

(This song has also furnished the words jingoism (bragging war spirit, Bobadilism) and the adjective jingo.)

Jimiwin (Mrs), a widow, the mother of Mrs Quip. A shrewd, ill-tempered old woman, who lived with her son-in-law in Tower Street.—C Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop (1840)

Jinker (Leutenant Jamie), horse-dealer at Doune.—Sir W Scott, Waterley (time, George II)

Jinn, plu of Jinnies, a sort of fairy in Arabian mythology, the offspring of fire. The jinn propagate their species like human beings, and are governed by kings called sultemans. Their chief abode is the mountain Kaf, and they appear to men under the forms of serpents, dogs, cats, etc., which become invisible at pleasure. Evil jinn are hideously ugly, but good jinn are exquisitely beautiful.

 Jinnistan means the country of the jinn. The connection of Solomon with the jinn is a mere blunder, arising from the similarity of suleyman and Solomon.

J J, in Hogarth's "Gin Lane," written on a gibbet, is sir Joseph Jekyll, obnoxious for his bill for increasing the duty on gin.

 Jean Jacques [Rousseau] was often referred to by these initials in the eighteenth century.

Jo, a poor little outcast, living in one of the back slums of London, called "Tom All-alone's." The little human waif is bounded about from place to place, till he dies of want.—C Dickens, Bleak House (1853)

Joan Cromwell's wife was always called Joan by the cavaliers, although her real name was Elizabeth.

Joan, princess of France, affianced to the duke of Orleans.—Sir W Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV)

Joan of Arc, surnamed La Pucelle, born in a village upon the marches of Barre, called Domremy, near Vaucoulenrs. Her father was James of Arc, and her mother Isabel, poor country-folk, who brought up their child to keep their cattle. Joan professed to be inspired to liberate France from the English, and actually raised the siege of Orleans, after which Charles II was crowned (1402-1431).

A young wench of an eighteen years' old of favour was she counted like some of person strong, made and manlike of courage great, hardie and stout withal she had great semblance of chastitie both of body and behaviour —Holinshed Chronicles 600 (1577)

there was no bloom of youth
Upon her cheek, yet had the loveliest hues
Of health with lesser fascination fixed
The glow of eye for woe the maiden was
Of saintly paleness, and there seemed to dwell
In the strong beauties of her countenance
Something that was not earthly Southey, Joan of Arc (1799)

 Schiller has a tragedy on the subject, Jungfrau von Orleans (1801), Sonnet another, Jeanne d'Aro (1825). Besides Southey's epic, we have one by Francis Czanneux, another by Chapelain, called La Pucelle (1656), on which he laboured for thirty years. Casimir Delavigne has an admirable elegy on She Maid (1846), and Voltaire a burlesque.

Joanna, the "deserted daughter" of Mr Mordent. Her father abandoned her in order to marry lady Anne, and his money-broker placed her under the charge of Mrs Enfield, who kept a house of intrigue. Cheveril fell in love with Joanna, and described her as having "blue eyes, auburn hair, aquiline nose, ivory teeth, carnation lips, a ravishing mouth, enchanting neck, a form divine, and the face of an angel"—Holerost, The Deserted Daughter (altered into The Steward).

Job and Elspat, father and mother of sergent Houghton.—Sir W Scott, Waterley (time, George II)

Job's Wife. Some call her Rahmat, daughter of Ephraim son of Joseph, and others call her Makhur, daughter of Manasses.—Sale, Korân, cxi note.

Jobhilles (The), the small gentry of a village, the squire being the Grand Panjandrum.

There were present the Plantinots and the Jobhilles and the Gargules, and the Grand Panjandrum himself.—S Foote The Quarterly Review xcv 616 7

Jobing, medical officer to the "Anglo-Bengalce Company." Mr Jobing was a portentous and most carefully dressed gentleman, fond of a good dinner, and said by all to be "full of anecdote" He was far too shrewd to be concerned with the Anglo-Bengalee bubble company, except as a paid functionary — C Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1811)

Jobson (Joseph), clerk to squire Inglewood the magistrate — Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Jobson (Zekel), a very masterful cobbler, who ruled his wife with a rod of iron

Neil Jobson, wife of Zekel, a patient, meek, sweet-tempered woman — C Colley, The Devil to Pay (died 1715)

Jock o' Dawston Cleugh, the quarrelsome neighbour of Dandie Dinmont, of Charlie's Hope

Jock Jabos, postilion to Mrs M'Candlish the landlady of the Golden Arms inn, Kippletringan

Slounging Jock, one of the men of M'Guffog the jailer — Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Jock o' Hazeldean, the young man beloved by a "lady fair" The lady's father wanted her to marry Frank, "the chief of Errington and laird of Langley Dale," rich, brave, and gallant, but "aye sho let the tears down fa' for Jock of Hazeldean." At length the wedding morn arrived, the kirk was gaily decked, the priest and bridegroom, with damo and knight were duly assembled, but no bride could be seen she had crossed the border and given her hand to Jock of Hazeldean

This ballad, by sir W Scott, is a modernized version of an ancient ballad entitled Jock o' Hazelgreen

Jockey of Norfolk, sir John Howard, a firm adherent of Richard III On the night before the battle of Bosworth Field, he found in his tent this warning couplet

Jockey of Norfolk be not too bold
For Dickon thy master is bought and sold.

Jodelet, valet of Du Croisy In order to reform two silly girls, whose nends have been turned by novels, Du Croisy and his friend La Grange get their lackeys introduced to them, as the "account of Jodelet" and the "marquis of Mascerville" The girls are delighted with their "aristocratic visitors," but when the game has gone far enough, the masters step in and unmask the trick The two girls are taught a most useful lesson, but are saved from serious ill consequences — Molière, Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659)

Joe, "the fat boy," page in the family of Mr Wardle He has an unlimited capacity for eating and sleeping — C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Joe Gargery, a smith He was a fair man, with curls of flaxen hair on each side of his smooth face, and with eyes of "such very undecided blue, that they seemed to have got mixed with their own whites He was a mild, good-natured, sweet-tempered, easy-going, foolish, dear fellow A Heron's in strength, and in weakness also" He lived in terror of his wife, but loved Pip, whom he brought up His great word was "meantersay" Thus "What I meantersay, if you come a-budgering me, come out Which I meantersay as sech, if you're a man, come on Which I meantersay that what I say I meantersay and stand to it" (ch xviii) His first wife was a shrew, but soon after her death he married Biddy, a young woman wholly suited to him

Mrs Joe Gargery, the smith's first wife, a "rampageous woman," always "on the ram-page" By no means good-looking was Mrs Joe, with her black hair, and fierce eyes, and prevailing redness of skin, looking as if "she scrubbed herself with a nutmeg-grater instead of soap and flannel" She "was tall and bony, and wore a coarse apron fastened over her figure behind with two loops, and having a square bib in front, stuck full of needles and pins" She brought up Pip, but made his home as wretched as she could, always keeping a rod called "Tickler" ready for immediate use Mrs Joe was a very clean woman, and cleanliness is next to godliness, but Mrs Joe had the art of making her cleanliness as disagreeable to every one as many people do their godliness She died after a long illness — C Dickens, Great Expectations (1860)

John, a proverbially unhappy name for royalty — See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, 461

We shall see however that this poor king [Robert II] remained as unfortunate as if his name had still been John [He changed it from John to Robert] — Sir W Scott Tales of a Grandfather 17

John, a Franciscan friar — Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1598)

John, the bastard brother of don Pedro — Shakespeare Much Ado about Nothing (1600)

John, the driver of the Queen's Ferry diligence—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.)

John (Don), brother of Leonato governor of Messina, whom he hates. In order to torment the governor, don John tries to mar the happiness of his daughter Hero, who is about to be married to lord Claudio. Don John tells Claudio that his fiancée has promised him a rendezvous by moonlight, and if Claudio will hide in the garden he may witness it. The villain had bribed the waiting-woman of Hero to dress up in her mistress's clothes and to give him this interview. Claudio believes the woman to be Hero, and when the bride appears at the altar next morning he rejects her with scorn. The truth, however, comes to light, don John takes himself to flight, and Hero is married to lord Claudio, the man of her choice—Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing (1600).

I have seen the great Hendersoh [1747-1785]. His John is a comic "Cato" and his Hamlet "a mixture of tragedy, comedy, pastoral farce and non sense."—David Garrick (1775).

John (Friar), a tall, lean, wide-mouthed, long-nosed friar of Seville, who despatched his minions and vigils quicker than any of his fraternity. He swore like a trooper, and fought like a Trojan. When the army from Lermé pillaged the convent vineyard, friar John seized the staff of a cross and pummelled the rogues without mercy, beating out brains, smashing limbs, cracking ribs, gashing faces, breaking jaws, dislocating joints, in the most approved Christian fashion, and never was eorn so mauled by the flail as were these pillagers by "the baton of the cross"—Rabelais, Gargantua, i. 27 (1533).

 Of course, this is a satire of what are called Christian or religious wars.

John (King), a tragedy by Shakespeare (1508). This drama is founded on The First and Second Parts of the Troublesome Raigne of John King of England, etc. As they were sundry tunes publicly acted by the Queenes Majesties players in the Honourable Citie of London (1591).

In Macbeth "Hamlet," Wolsey "Coriolanus" and King John "he [Edmund Kean 1787-1833] never approached within any measurable distance of the learned philosophical, and majestic hembie."—Quarterly Review (1833).

W. C. Macready [1793-1873]. In the scene where he suggests to "Hubert" the murder of Arthur "was masterly and his representation of death by poison was raw, forcible and terrific."—Talfourd.

 Kynge Johan, a drama of the transition state between the moralities and tragedy. Of the historical persons introduced we have King John, pope Innocent, cardinal Pandulphus, Stephen Langton, etc., and of allegorical personages we have Widowed Britannia, Imperial Majesty, Nobility, Clergy, Civil Order, Treason, Verity, and Sedition. This play was published in 1838 by the Camden Society, under the care of Mr. Collier (about 1550).

John (Little), one of the companions of Robin Hood—Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I.).

John (Prester). According to Mandeville, Prester John was a lineal descendant of Ogier the Dane. This Ogier penetrated into the north of India with fifteen barons of his own country, among whom he divided the land. John was made sovereign of Tenedue, and was called Prester because he converted the natives.

Another tradition says he had seventy kings for his vassals, and was seen by his subjects only three times a year.

Mareo Polo says that Prester John was the Khan Ung, who was slain in battle by Jenghiz Khan, in 1202. He was converted by the Nestorians, and his baptismal name was John Gregory Bar-Ihebreus, says that God forsook him because he had taken to himself a wife of the Zimish nation, called Quarakhata.

Otto of Freisingen is the first author who makes mention of Prester John. His chronicle is brought down to the year 1156, and in it we are assured that this most mysterious personage was of the family of the Magi, and ruled over the country of these Wise Men. "He used" (according to Otto) "a sceptre made of emeralds."

Bishop Jordānus, in his description of the world, sets down Abyssinia as the kingdom of Prester John. At one time Abyssinia went by the name of Middle India.

Maimonides mentions Prester John, and calls him Presto-Curan. The date of Maimonides is 1135-1204.

 Before 1241 a letter was addressed by Prester John to Manuel Comnenus, emperor of Constantinople. It is to be found in the Chronicle of Albericus Trium Fontium, who gives the date as 1165.

In Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, xvii, Prester John is called Senn'pus king of Ethiopia. He was blind. Though the richest monarch of the world, he pined "in plenty with endless famine," because harpies carried off his food whenever the table was spread, but this plague was to cease "when a stranger came to his kingdom on a flying horse" Astolpho came on a flying griffin, and with his magic horn chased the harpies into Cocytus

John (Prince), son of Henry II, introduced by sir W Scott in The Betrothed (1825)

John (Prince), brother of Richard I, introduced by sir W Scott in The Talisman (1825)

John and the abbot of Canterbury King John, being jealous of the state kept by the abbot of Canterbury, declared he should be put to death unless he answered these three questions (1) "How much am I worth?" (2) how long would it take me to ride round the world? and (3) what are my thoughts?" The king gave the abbot three weeks for his answers. A shepherd undertook to disguise himself as the abbot, and to answer the questions. To the first he said, "The king's worth is twenty-nine pence, for the Saviour Himself was sold for thirty pence, and his majesty is mayhap a penny worse than He." To the second question he answered, "If you rise with the sun and ride with the sun, you will get round the world in twenty-four hours." To the third question he replied, "Your majesty thinks me to be the abbot, but I am only his servant"—Perey, Reliques, II in 6

John Blunt, a person who prides himself on his brusqueness, and in speaking unpleasant truths in the rudest manner possible. He not only calls a spade a spade, but he does it in an offensive tone and manner

In old times, John Company employed nearly 4000 men in warehouses.—Old and New London II. 18.

John Grueby, the honest, faithful servant of lord George Gordon, who wished "the blessed old erectur, named Bloody Mary, had never been born." He had the habit of looking "a long way off." John loved his master, but hated his religious craze Between Bloody Marys and blue cockades, and glorious queen Besses, and no poperys and protestant associations," said Grueby to himself. "I believe my lord's off his head."—Dickens, Barnaby Rudge, xxxv.

John of Bruges (1 syl), John van Eyck, the Flemish painter (1370-1441)

John o' Groat, a Dutchman, who settled in the most northerly part of Scotland in the reign of James IV. He is immortalized by the way he settled an open dispute among his nine sons respecting precedence. He had nine doors made to his cottage, one for each son, and they sat at a round table

From John o' Groat's house to the Land's End, from furthest north to furthest south of the island, &c through its entire length

John of Hexham, Johannes Hagus taldensis, a chronicler (twelfth century)

John of Leyden, John Boekhold or Boecold, a fanatic (1510-1536)

In the opera, he is called "the prophet." Being about to marry Bertha, three anabaptists meet him, and observe in him a strong likeness to a picture of David in Munster Cathedral. Having induced him to join the rebels, they take Munster, and crown him "Ruler of Westphalia." His mother meets him while he is going in procession, but he disowns her, subsequently, however, he visits her in prison, and is forgiven. When the emperor arrives, the anabaptists fall off, and John, setting fire to the banquet-room of the palace, perishes with his mother in the flames.—Meyerbeer, Le Prophete (1849)

John with the Leaden Sword The duke of Bedford, who acted as regent for Henry VI in France, was so called by earl Douglas (surnamed Zinc-man)

Johnny, the infant son of Mrs Betty Higden's "daughter's daughter." Mrs Boffin wished to adopt the child, and to call him John Harmon, but it died. During its illness, Bella Wilfer went to see it, and the child murmured, "Who is the boofer lady?" The sick child was placed in the Children's Hospital, and, just at the moment of death, gave his toys to a little boy with a broken leg in an adjoining bed, and sent "a kiss to the boofer lady"—C Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1864)

Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman was so called by English sailors in the time of Napoleon I. The Flemings called the French "Crapaud Franchos." The allusion is to the toads borne in the ancient arms of France

Johnson (Dr Samuel), lexicographer, essayist, and poet (1709-1784)

*I own I like not Johnson's turgid style,
That gives an inch the importance of a mile
Casts of manure a wagon-load around,
To raise a simple daisy from the ground
Uplifts the club of Hercules—for what?
To crush a butterfly or brain a snail
Creates a whirlwind from the earth to draw
A goose's feather or emit a straw
Bids ocean labour with tremendous roar
To heave a cockle-shell upon the shore
Alike in every theme his pompous art
Heaven's awful thunder or a humbling cart.
Pe or Pindar (Dr John Wolcott) (1816)*

Johnstone (Auld Willie), an old fisherman, father to Peggy the laundry-maid at Woodburne

Young Johnstone, his son—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Jollup (Sir Jacob), father of Mrs Terry Sneak and Mrs Brown Jollup is the vulgar pomposo landlord of Garratt, who insists on being always addressed as "sir Jacob"

Err Again err
Sir J. "Sir!" drab! and why not "sir Jacob"? you rascal! Is that all your manners? Has his majesty dubbed me knight, for you to make me a mister!—S Foote, The Mayor of Garratt, 1.1 (1763)

Jolter In the agony of terror, on hearing the direction given to put on the dead-lights in a storm off Calais, Smollett tells us that Jolter went through the steps of a mathematical proposition with great fervour instead of a prayer

Jonas, the name given, in Absalom and Achitophel, to sir William Jones, attorney-general, who conducted the prosecution of the popish plot—Dryden, Absalom and Achitophel, 1 (1681)

Jonathan, a sleek old widower He was a parish orphan, whom sir Benjamin Dove apprenticed, and then took into his family When Jonathan married, the knight gave him a farm rent free and well stocked. On the death of his wife, he gave up the farm, and entered the knight's service as butler Under the evil influence of lady Dove, this old servant was inclined to neglect his kind master, but sir Benjamin soon showed him that, although the lady was allowed to peck him, the servants were not.—R. Cumberland, The Brothers (1769)

Jon'athan, one of the servants of general Harrison—Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Jon'athan, an attendant on lord Saville—Sir W Scott, Perpet of the Peal (time, Charles II)

Jonathan (Brother), a national nickname for an American of the United States In the Revolutionary war, Washington used to consult his friend Jonathan Trumbull, governor of Connecticut, in all his difficulties "We must ask brother Jonathan," was so often on his lips, that the phrase became synonymous with the good genius of the States, and was subsequently applied to the North Americans generally

Jonathan's, a noted coffee-house in 'Change Alley, described in The Tatler as the "general mart for stock-jobbers" What is now termed "The Royal Stock Exchange" was at one time called "Jonathan's"

Yesterday the brokers and others came to a resolution that (the new building) instead of being called "New Jonathan's," should be called "The Stock Exchange." The brokers all collected at six o'clock each and changed the house.—Newspaper paragraph (July 12, 1773)

Jones (Tom), the hero of a novel by Fielding, called The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1749) Tom Jones is a model of generosity, openness, and manly spirit, mingled with thoughtless dissipation With all this, he is not to be admired, his reputation is flawed, he sponges for a guinea, he cannot pay his landlord, and he lets out his honour to hire

The romance of Tom Jones that exquisite picture of human manners will outline the palace of the Emperor and the Imperial eagle of Austria.—Gibbon.

To Tom Jones is added the charm of a plot of unshared skill in which the complex threads of interest are all brought to bear upon the catastrophe in a manner equally unexpected and timely.—Fraser Brit Art. Literature.

Jones (Mrs), the waiting-woman of lady Penfeather—Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Jonson (Ben), the poet, introduced by sir Walter Scott in his Woodstock Shakespeare is introduced in the same novel

Jordan (Mrs), the actress, who lived with the duke of Clarence, was Miss Dorothea Bland. She called herself Dora, first appeared in York as Miss Francis, and changed her name at the request of an aunt who left her a little property. When the change of name was debated between her and the manager, Tate suggested "Mrs Jordan," and gave this very pertinent reason

You have crossed the water "said Tate "so I'll call you Jordan "

Jorkins, the partner of Mr Spcnlow, in Doctors' Commons. Mr Jorkins is really a retiring, soft-hearted man, but to clients he is referred to by Spcnlow as the stern martinet, whose consent will be most difficult to obtain — C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Jorworth-ap-Jevan, envoy of Gwynn, prince of Powys-land — Sir W Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Josaphat, a young Indian prince, of whom it had been predicted that he would embrace Christianity and become a devotee. His father tried to seclude him from all knowledge of misery and evil, and to attach him only to pleasurable pursuits. At length the young prince took three drives, in one of which he saw Old Age, in another Sickness, and in the third Death. This had such an effect upon him that he became a hermit, and at death was canonized both by the Eastern and Western Churches — Johannes Damascenus, Barlaam and Josaphat (eighth century)

Josceline (Sir), an English knight and crusader in the army of Richard I — Sir W Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I)

José (Don), father of don Juan, and husband of donna Inez. He was hen-pecked and worried to death by his wife's "proprieties." To the world they were "models of respectability," but at home they were "cat and dog." Donna Inez tried to prove him mad, in order to obtain a divorce, and "kept a journal where all his faults were noted." "She witnessed his agonies with great magnanimity," but, while seeking a divorce, don José died — Byron, Don Juan, 1 26, 33 (1819)

Joseph, the old gardener at Shaw's Castle — Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Joseph, a Jew of the noblest type, with unbounded benevolence and most silent charity. He sets a splendid example of "Christian ethics" to those who despised him for not believing the "Christian creed." Joseph the Jew was the good friend of the Christian minister of Mariendorpt — S Knowles, The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838)

Joseph (A), a young man not to be seduced from his continency by any temptation. The reference is to Joseph in Potiphar's house (Gen xxxix)

Joseph (St) of Arimathea, said to have brought to Glastonbury in a mystic vessel some of the blood which trickled from the wounds of Christ at the Crucifixion, and some of the wine left at the Last Supper. This vessel plays a very prominent part in the Arthurian legends

Next holy Joseph came
The Saviour of mankind in sepulchre that laid
That to the Britons was th' apostle. In his aid St. Durlan and with him St. Fagan both which were His scholars

Drayton Polyolbion xxiv (1600)

 He also brought with him the spear of Longinus, the Roman soldier who pierced the side of Jesus — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 40 (1470)

 The "mystic vessel" brought by Joseph is sometimes called the San Grial, but by referring to the word GRIAL, it will be seen that the usual meaning of the term in Arthurian romance is very different

Joséphine (3 syl), wife of Werner, and mother of Ulric. Joséphine was the daughter of a dejected Italian exile of noble blood — Byron, Werner (1822)

Jos'ian, daughter of the king of Armenia, and wife of sir Bevis of Southampton. It was Josian who gave the hero his sword "Morglay" and his steed "Arundel" — Drayton, Polyolbion, 11 (1612)

Josse (1 syl), a jeweller. Lucinde (2 syl), the daughter of Sganarelle, pined and fell away, and the anxious father asked his neighbours what they would advise him to do. Mon Josse replied

Pour moi, Je tiens que la braverie que l'autr tenent est la chose qui réjouit le plus les filles et si j'étois que de vous, je lui achèterois dès aujourd'hui une belle garniture de diamants ou de rubis, ou d'émeraudes

Sganarelle made answer

Vous êtes orfèvre Monsieur Josse et votre conseil sent son homme qui a envie de se désoler de sa marchandise. — Molière, L'Amour Médecin 1. 1 (1665)

Vous êtes orfèvre, Mon Josse ("You are a jeweller, Mon Josse, and are not disinterested in your advice") (See above)

Jo'tham, the person who uttered the parable of "The Trees choosing a King," when the men of Shechem made Abimelech king. In Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, it stands for George Saville, marquis of Halifax.

Jotham of piercing wit and pregnant thought,
Endued by nature, and by learning taught
To more assemblies turned the balance too,
So much the weight of one brave man can do.
Dryden Absalom and Achitophel, l. (1631)

Jour des Morts (All Souls' Day) A Dieppe legend explains the phrase thus

Le gretteur de la jetée voit au milieu de la nuit arriver un bateau à la hèle il s'empresse de lui jeter la grelle mais à ce moment même le bateau disparaît on entend des cris plaintifs qui font frissonner car on les reconnaît c'est la voix des marins qui ont naufragé dans l'année.—
Chapuis, Dieppe et ses Environs (1833)

Jour king of Mambrant, the person who carried off Jos'ian the wife of sir Bevis of Southampton, his sword "Morglay," and his steed "Ar'undel." Sir Bevis, disguised as a pilgrim, recovered all three—Drayton, Polyolbion, ii (1612)

Jourdain (Mons), an elderly tradesman, who has suddenly fallen into a large fortune, and wishes to educate himself up to his new position in society. He employs masters of dancing, fencing, philology, and so on, and the fun of the drama turns on the ridiculous remarks that he makes, and the awkward figure he cuts as the pupil of these professors. One remark is especially noted he says he had been talking prose all his life, and never knew it till his professor told him—Molière, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (1670)

Journalists Napoleon I said

A Journalist is a grumbler a censurer a giver of advice a regent of sovereigns a tutor of nations. Four hostile newspapers are more formidable than a thousand bayonets.

Jovian, emperor of Rome, was bathing one day, when a person stole his clothes and passed himself off as the emperor Jovian, naked and ashamed, went to a knight, said he was emperor, and begged the loan of a few garments for the nonce, but the knight called him an impostor, and had him scourged from the gate. He next went to a duke, who was his chief minister, but the duke had him confined, and fed on bread and water as a vagrant and a madman. He then applied at the palace, but no one recognized him there. Lastly, he went to his confessor, and humbled himself, confessing his sins. The priest took him to the palace, and the sham emperor proved to be an angel sent to reform the proud monarch. The story says that Jovian thenceforth reigned with mercy and justice, till he died.—Evenings with the Old Story-tellers

Joyeuse (2 syl), Charlemagne's sword, which bore the inscription Decem praeceptorum custos Carolus. It was buried with the king, as Tizo'na (the Cid's sword) was buried with the Cid.

Joyeuse-Garde or Garde-Joyeuse, the estate given by King Arthur to sir Launcelot du Lac for defending the queen's honour against sir Mador. Here sir Launcelot was buried.

Joyous Isle, the place to which sir Launcelot retired during his fit of madness, which lasted two years.

Juan (Don), a hero of the sixteenth century, a natural son of Charles-quint, born at Ratisbonne, in 1545. He conquered the Moors of Granada, won a great naval victory over the Turks at Lepanto, made himself master of Tunis, and put down the insurgents of the Netherlands (1545-1578).

This is the don Juan of C. Delavigne's drama entitled Don Juan d'Autriche (1835).

Juan (Don), son of don Louis Tenorio, of Sicily, a heartless roué. His valet says of him

Tu vois en don Juan le plus grand séducteur que la terre ait jamais porté un enragé un chien un démon, un Turc, un hérétique qui ne croit ni ciel ni enfer ni arabe qui passo cette vie en véritable bête brute un pourceau d'Epicure un vrai Sardanapale qui ferme l'oreille à toutes les remontrances qu'on lui peut faire et traite de bille vesettes tout ce que nous croyons.—Molière Don Juan, l. 1 (1665)

Juan (Don), a native of Seville, son of don José and donna Inez (a blue-stock- ing). When Juan was 16 years old, he got into trouble with donna Julia, and was sent by his mother (then a widow) on his travels. His adventures form the story of a poem so called, but the tale is left incomplete—Lord Byron, Don Juan (1819-21).

Juan (Don), or don Giovanni, the prince of libertines. The original of this character was don Juan Tenorio, of Seville, who attempted the seduction of the governor's daughter, and the father, forcing the libertine to a duel, fell. A statue of the murdered father was erected in the family vault, and one day, when don Juan forced his way into the vault, he invited the statue to a banquet. The statue accordingly placed itself at the board, to the amazement of the host, and, compelling the libertine to follow, delivered him over to devils, who carried him off triumphant

Dramatized first by Gabriel Tellez (1626) Molière (1665) and Thomas Corneille, in Le Festin de Pierre, both imitated from the Spanish (1673), have made it the subject of French comedies, Goldoni (1765), of an Italian comedy, Gluck, of a musical ballet (1765), Mozart, of an opera called Don Giovanni (1787), a princely work

Juan Fernandez, a rocky island in the Pacific Ocean, near the coast of Chili Here Alexander Selkirk, a buccaneer, resided in solitude for four years Defoe is supposed to have based his tale of Robinson Crusoe on the history of Alexander Selkirk

* * Defoe places the island of his hero "on the east coast of South America," somewhere near Dutch Guiana

Juba, prince of Numidia, warmly attached to Cato while he lived at Utica (in Africa), and passionately in love with Marcia, Cato's daughter Sempronius, having disguised himself as Juba, was mistaken for the Numidian prince by Marcia, and being slain, she gave free vent to her grief, thus betraying the state of her affection Juba overheard her, and as it would have been mere prudery to deny her love after this display, she freely confessed it, and Juba took her as his betrothed and future wife — J Addison, Cato (1713)

Jubal, son of Lamech and Adah The inventor of the lyre and flute — Gen iv 19-21

Then when he [Javan] heard the voice of Jubal's lyre Instinctive genius caught the ethereal fire

Judas, in pt ii of Absalom and Achitophel, by Tate, is meant for Mr Ferguson, a nonconformist, who joined the duke of Monmouth, and afterwards betrayed him

Shall that false Hebronite escape our curse—
Judas that keeps the rebels pension purse
Judas, that pays the treason writer's fee
Judas, that well deserves his namesake's tree?
Absalom and Achitophel II (1682).

Judas Colour In the old mystery-plays, Judas had hair and beard of a fiery red colour

Let their beads be Judas's own colour
Thomas Heyd, The Spanish Tragedy (1597).

Judas Iscariot Klopstock says that Judas Iscariot had a heart formed every virtue, and was in youth nated by crime, inasmuch that the Messiah thought him worthy of being one of the twelve He, however, was jealous of John, because Jesus loved him more than He loved the rest of the apostles, and thus hatred towards the beloved disciple made him hate the lover of "the beloved" Judas also feared (says Klopstock) that John would have a higher post than himself in the kingdom, and perhaps be made treasurer The poet tells us that Judas betrayed Jesus under the expectation that it would drive Him to establish His kingdom at once, and rouse Him into action — Klopstock, The Messiah, in (1748)

Judas Tree, a gallows

* * The garden shrub called the Judas tree is a mere blunder for huamos tree, i.e. the bean tree, but the corrupt name has given rise to the legend that Judas hanged himself on one of these trees

Judi (Al), the mountain on which the ark rested The word is a corruption of Al Kurdu, so called because it was inhabited by the Kurds The Greeks corrupted the name into Gordyri, and the mountain was often called the Gordyrian

The ark rested on the mountain Al Judi—Al Koran, xi

Judith, a beautiful Jewess of Bethulia, who assassinated Holofernes, the general of Nebuchadnezzar, to save her native town When Judith showed the head of the general to her countrymen, they rushed on the invading army, and put it to a complete rout — Judith vii, x-xx

Judith (Aunt), sister to Master George Heriot the king's goldsmith — Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Judy, the wife of Punch Master Punch, unmoved by the cries of the baby, gives it a knock, which kills it, and, to conceal his crime from his wife, throws the dead body out of the window Judy comes to inquire about the child, and, hearing of its death, upbraids her lord stantly, and tries on him the "reproof of blows" This leads to a quarrel, in which Judy is killed The officers of justice, coming to arrest the domestic tyrant, meet the same fate as his child and wife, but at last the devil outwits him, he is hanged, and carried off to the place of all evil-doers

Juel (Nils), a celebrated Danish admiral, who received his training under

Tromp and De Ruyter He defeated the Swedes in 1677 in several engagements

His Juel gave heed to the tempest's roar
Of Denmark's Juel who can defy
The power?"

Julet'ta, the witty, sprightly attendant of Alinda — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Pilgrim (1621)

Julia, a lady beloved by Prothesus Her waiting-woman is Lucetta — Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona (1591)

Julia, the "ward" of Master Walter "the hunchback" She was brought up by him most carefully in the country, and at a marriageable age was betrothed to sir Thomas Clifford Being brought to London, she was carried away in the vortex of fashion, and became the votary of pleasure and dissipation, abandoned Clifford, and promised to marry the earl of Roehdale As the wedding day drew nigh, her love for Clifford returned, and she implored her guardian to break off her promise of marriage to the earl Walter now showed himself to be the real earl of Roehdale, and father of Julia Her nuptials with the supposed earl fell to the ground, and she became the wife of sir Thomas Clifford — S Knowles, The Hunchback (1831)

Ju'ha (Donna), a lady of Seville, of Moorish origin, a married woman, "charming, chaste, and twenty-three" Her eye was large and dark, her hair glossy, her brow smooth, her cheek "all purple with the beam of youth," her husband 50, and his name Alfonso Donna Julia loved a lad of 16, named don Juan, "not wisely but too well," for which she was confined in a convent — Byron, Don Juan, 1 59-188 (1819)

Tender and impassioned but possessing neither information to occupy her mind nor good principles to regulate her conduct, donna Julia is an illustration of the women of Seville whose minds have but one idea and whose life business is intrigue "The love of every impulse she now prostrates herself before the altar of the Virgin making, the noblest efforts for honour pride religion virtues sake" and then in the full security of innocence she seeks temptation and finds retreat impossible — Flinders Byron Decretes.

Julia Melville, a ward of sir Anthony Absolute, in love with Faulkland, who saved her life when she was thrown into the water by the upsetting of a boat — Sheridan, The Rivals (1775)

Julian (Count), a powerful lord of the Spanish Goths When his daughter Florinda was violated by king Roderick, the count was so indignant that he invited over the Moors to come and push Roderick from the throne, and even turned renegade the better to effect his purpose The Moors succeeded, but condemned count Julian to death, "to punish treachery, and prevent worse ill" Julian, before he died, sent for "father Maccabee," and said

I would fain
Die in the faith wherein my fathers died
I feel that I have sinned, and from my soul
Renounce the impostor's faith which in my soul
No place obtained.

Southey Federick etc., xlv (1814)

Julian (St), patron saint of hospitality An epicure, a man of hospitality

An householder and that a greet was he,
Saint Julian he was in his countrie

Chaucer Introduction to Canterbury Tales (1383)

Julian St Pierre, the brother of Mariana (qv) — S Knowles, The Wife (1833)

Juliana, eldest daughter of Balthaza A proud, arrogant, overbearing "Katharine," who marries the duke of Aranza, and intends to be lady paramount The duke takes her to a poor but, which he calls his home, gives her the household duties to perform, and pretends to be a day labourer She chafes for a time, but his manliness, affection, and firmness get the mastery; and when he sees that she loves him for himself, he announces the fact that after all he is the duke and she the duchess of Aranza — J Tobin, The Honeymoon (1801)

Ju'lance, a grant — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 98 (1470)

Julie (2 syl), the heroine of Molière's comedy entitled Mons de Pourceaugnac (1669)

Ju'he (2 syl), the heroine of J J Rousseau's novel entitled Julie ou la Nouvelle Héloïse (1760) The prototype was the comtesse d'Iloudetot Julie had a pale complexion, a graceful figure, a profusion of light brown hair, and her near-sightedness gave her "a charming mixture of gaucherie and grace" Rousseau went every morning to meet her, that he might receive from her that single kiss with which Frenchwomen salute a friend One day, when Rousseau told her that she might innocently love others besides her husband, she naively replied, "Je pourrais done aimer mon pauvre St Lambert" Lord Byron has made her familiar to English readers

His love was passion's essence
This breathed itself to life in Julie this Love told her with all that's wild and sweet
This hallowed love —
Which every
From her's

would meet.

Byron Claire Harold III. 73 (1811)

Julie de Mortemar, an orphan, ward of Richelieu, and loved by king Louis XIII, count Baradas, and Adrien de Blauprat, the last of whom she married. After many hair-breadth escapes and many a heart-ache, the king allowed the union and blessed the happy pair — Lord Lytton, Richelieu (1839)

Ju'liet, daughter of lady Capulet of Verona, in love with Romeo son of Montague (3 syl), a rival house. As the parents could not be brought to sanction the alliance, the whole intercourse was clandestine. In order that Juliet might get from the house and meet Romeo at the cell of friar Laurence, she took a sleeping draught, and was carried to the family vault. The intention was that on waking she should repair to the cell and get married, but Romeo, seeing her in the vault, killed himself from grief, and when Juliet woke and found Romeo dead, she killed herself also — Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1598)

C. H. Wilson says of Mrs Baddeley (1742-1780) that her "Juliet" was never surpassed. W. Donaldson, in his Recollections, says that "Miss O'Neill made her first appearance in Covent Garden Theatre in 1815 as 'Juliet,' and never was such an impression made before by any actress whatsoever." Miss Fanny Kemble and Miss Helen Faucet were both excellent in the same character. The youngest Juliet was Miss Rosa Kenney (under 18), who made her debut in this character at Drury Lane in 1879.

The darling fondness and silly foolishness of the nurse (sic) to relieve the soft and affectionate character of Juliet "and to give her before the audience in a point of view which those who have seen Miss O'Neill perform Juliet" know how to appreciate — Sir W. Scott, The Drama.

Juliet, the lady beloved by Claudio brother of Isabella — Shakespeare, Measure for Measure (1603)

Ju'lio, a noble gentleman, in love with Lelia a wanton widow — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Captain (1613)

Julio of Harancour, "the deaf and dumb" boy, ward of Darlemont, who gets possession of Julio's inheritance, and abandons him in the streets of Paris. Julio is rescued by the abbé De l'Epée, who brings him up, and gives him the name of Theodore. Julio grows up a noble-minded and intelligent young man, is recognized by the Frival family, and Darlemont confesses that "the deaf and dumb" boy is the count of Harancour — Th. Holcroft, The Deaf Dumb (1785)

Julius (St), a British martyr of Caerleon or the City of Legions (Newport, in South Wales). He was torn limb from limb by Maximianus Hercules, general of the army of Diocletian in Britain. Two churches were founded in the City of Legions, one in honour of St Julius, and one in honour of St Aaron his fellow-martyr.

Two other sealed their doctrine with their blood. St. John and with him St. Aaron have their room at Caerleon, suffering death by Diocletian's order. Drayton, Polydoron xiv (1621)

June (The Glorious First of) was June, 1794, when lord Howe gained a great victory over the French.

The mountain of Kâf may tremble but the power of Allah remaineth fast for ever and ever — Beckford Vathek (1784)

Kâf, a fountain, the waters of which confer immortality on the drinker

Sure his lips
Have drunk of Kâf's dark fountain and he comes Strong in his immortality
Southey, Roderick etc, xiv (1814)

Kail, a prince of Ad, sent to Mecca to pray for rain Three clouds appeared, a white one, a red one, and a black one, and Kail was bidden to make his choice He chose the last, but when the cloud burst, instead of rain it cast out lightning, which killed him. — Sale, Al Korân, vii note

Kail'yâl (2 syl), the lovely and holy daughter of Ladur'lad, persecuted relentlessly by Ar'vialan, but virtuous and chastity, in the person of Kail'yâl, always triumphed over sin and lust When Ar'vialan "in the flesh" attempted to dishonour Kail'yâl, he was slain by Ladur'lad, but he then continued his attacks "out of the flesh" Thus, when Kail'yâl was taken to the Bower of Bliss by a benevolent spirit, Ar'vialan borrowed the dragon-car of the witch Lor'rimate (3 syl) to drag him thence, the dragons, however, unable to mount to paradise, landed him in a region of thick-ribbed ice Again, Kail'yâl, being obliged to quit the Bower, was made the bride of Jaganaut, and when Ar'vialan presented himself before her again, she set fire to the pagoda, and was carried from the flames by her father, who was charmed from fire as well as water Lastly, while waiting for her father's return from the submerged city, whither he had gone to release Ereen'ra (3 syl), Ar'vialan once more appeared, but was seized by Baly, the governor of hell, and cast into the bottomless pit Having descended to hell, Kail'yâl quaffed the water of immortality, and was taken by Ereen'ra to his Bower of Bliss, to dwell with him for ever in endless joy — Southey, Curse of Kehama (1809)

Kate [PLOWDEN], niece of colonel Howard of New York, in love with lieutenant Barnstable of the British navy, but promised by the colonel in marriage to captain Boroughliff, a vulgar, conceited Yankee Ultimately, it is discovered that Barnstable is the colonel's son, and the marriage is arranged amicably between Barnstable and Kate — E Fitzball, The Pilot

Katharina, the elder daughter of Baptista of Padua She was of such an ungovernable spirit and fiery temper, that she was nicknamed "The Shrew" As it was very unlikely any gentleman would select such a spitfire for his wife, Baptista made a vow that his younger daughter Bianca should not be allowed to marry before her sister Petruchio married Katharina and tamed her into a most submissive wife, inasmuch that when she visited her father a bet was made by Petruchio and two other bridegrooms on their three brides First Lucentio sent a servant to Bianca to desire her to come into the room, but Bianca sent word that she was busy Hortensio next sent the servant "to entreat" his bride to come to him, but she replied that Hortensio had better come to her if he wanted her Petruchio said to the servant, "Tell your mistress I command her to come to me at once," she came at once, and Petruchio won the bet — Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew (1594)

Katharine, a lady in attendance on the princess of France Dumain, a young lord in the suite of Ferdinand king of Navarre, asks her hand in marriage, and she replies

Katin'ka, a Georgian, "white and red, with great blue eyes, a lovely hand and arm, and feet so small they scarce seemed made to tread, but rather skim the earth" She was one of the three beauties of the harem, into which don Juan was admitted in female disguise The other two were Lolah and Dudu — Byron, Don Juan, vi 40, 41 (1824)

Katmîr, the dog of the seven sleepers It spoke with a human voice and said to the young men who wanted to drive it out of the cave, "I love those who love God Go to sleep, masters, and I will keep guard" The dog kept guard over them for 309 years, and neither slept nor ate At death it was taken up into paradise—Sale, Al Korân, xiii notes

* * Katmur, in the Oriental Tales, is called "Catmur"

The shepherd had a little dog named Catmur [sic] that followed them. They threw a stone at him to drive him back the stone broke his left leg but the dog still followed them, limping. They then threw another stone at the dog and broke his right fore leg. It now followed them on its two hind legs, and a third stone having broken one of these the poor creature could no longer stand. God now gave it the gift of speech at which they were so astonished that they carried it with them by turns—Comte de Cayla's Oriental Tales (Duklano and the Seven Sleepers," 1743)

He wouldn't give a bone to Katmur, or He wouldn't throw a bone to the dog of the seven sleepers, an Arabic proverb, applied to a very niggardly man

Kay (Sir), son of sir Ector, and foster-brother of prince Arthur, who made him his seneschal or steward Sir Kay was ill-tempered, mean-spirited, boastful, and overbearing. He had not strength of mind enough to be a villain like Hagen, nor strength of passion enough to be a traitor like Ganelon and Mordred, but he could detract and calumniate, could be envious and spiteful, could annoy and irritate. His wit consisted in giving nicknames. Thus he called young Gareth "Big Hands" (Beaumains), "because his hands were the largest that ever any one had seen" He called sir Brevnor "The Shoeing Bad Colt" (La Côte Male-taile), because his doublet fitted him so badly, and was full of sword-cuts—Sir F. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 3, 1, 120, etc (1470) (See KRY)

Keepers, of Piers Plowman's visions, the Malvern Hills. Piers Plowman (W or R Langland, 1362) supposes himself fallen asleep on the Malvern Hills, and in his dream he sees various visions of an allegorical character pass before him. These "visions" he put into poetry, the whole containing 15,000 verses, divided into twenty parts, each part being called a passus or separate vision.

Keepers of Piers Plowman's vision thro the sunthre and the snow

Mrs. Browning, The Lor. House

Keha'ma, the almighty ruler of earth, and all-powerful in Swerga or heaven. After a long tyranny, he went to Pan'dalon (hell) to claim domination there also. Kehama demanded why the throne of Yamen (or Pluto) was supported by only three persons, and was told that he himself must be the fourth. He paid no heed to this prophecy, but commanded the amreeta-enp or draught of immortality to be brought to him, that he might quaff it and reign for ever. Now there are two immortalityes: the immortality of life for the good, and the immortality of death for the wicked. When Kehama drank the amreeta, he drank immortal death, and was forced to bend his proud neck beneath the throne of Yamen, to become the fourth supporter—Southey, Curse of Kehama (1809)

* * Ladurlad was the person subjected to the "curse of Kehama," and under that name the story will be found.

Kenge (1 syl), of the firm of Kenge and Carboy, Lincoln's Inn, generally called "Conversation Kenge," loving above all things to hear "the dulcet tones of his own voice." The firm is engaged on the side of Mr Jarndyce in the great Chancery suit of "Jarndyce v Jarndyce"—C Dickens, Bleak House (1853)

Kenelm (St) was murdered at Clent's-in-Cowbage, near Wincheleumb, in Gloucestershire, but the murder "was miraculously notified at Rome by a white dove," which alighted on the altar of St Peter's, bearing in its beak a scroll with these words

Kenilworth, a novel by sir W Scott (1821). This is very superior to The Abbot and The Monastery. For interest it comes next to Ivanhoe, and the portrait of queen Elizabeth is life-like and correct. That of queen Mary is given in The Abbot. The novel is full of courtly gaieties and splendour, but contains the unhappy tale of the beautiful Amy Robsart, which cannot fail to excite our sympathy and pity.

Kenna, daughter of king Oböron, who fell in love with Albion son of the island king. Oböron drove the prince from his empire, and when Albion made war on the fairy king, he was slain. Kenna then poured the juice of moly over him, and the dead body was converted into a snowdrop. According to this fable, "Kensington Gardens" is a corruption of Kenna's-town-garden—Tickell, Kensington Garden (died 1740).

Kenrick (Felix), the old foster-father of Caroline Dormer. His wife Judith was her nurse. Kenrick, an Irishman, clings to his mistress in all her misfortunes, and proves himself a most attached, disinterested, and faithful old servant—G Colman, The Heir at Law (1797).

Kensington, according to Tickell's fable, is so called from the fairy Kenna, daughter of king Oböron. The tale is that prince Albion was stolen by Milkali, the fairy, and carried to Kensington. When 19 years old, he fell in love with Kenna, but Oberon was so angry at this engagement, that he drove Albion out of the garden, and compelled Kenna to marry Azurick, a fairy from Holland Park. Albion laid his complaint before Neptune, who sent Orisel with a fairy army against Oberon. In this battle Albion was slain, and Neptune, in revenge, utterly destroyed the whole empire. The fairies, being dispersed, betook themselves to the hills and dales, the caves and mines. Kenna poured juice of the herb moly over the dead body of Albion, and the unhappy prince was changed thus into a snowdrop—Tickell, Kensington Garden (died 1740).

Kent. According to fable, Kent is so called from Canute, one of the companions of Brute the Trojan wanderer, who, according to Geoffrey's British History, settled in England, and founded a dynasty of kings. Canute had that part of the island assigned to him which was called Canutium, contracted into Cantrum, and again into Cant or Kent.

But Canute had his portion from the rest,
The which he called Canutium for his hire,
Now Cantrum what he Kent we commonly inquire.
Piercy's Fairy Queen II. c. 12 (1609)

Kent (Earl of), under the assumed name of Caius, attended upon the old king Lear, when his two elder daughters refused to entertain him with his suite. He afterwards took him to Dover Castle. When the old king was dying, he could not be made to understand how Caius and Kent could be the same person—Shakespeare, King Lear (1605).

Kent (The Fair Maid of), Joan, only daughter of Edmund Plantagenet earl of Kent. She married thrice (1) William de Montacute earl of Salisbury, from whom she was divorced, (2) sir Thomas Holland, and (3) her second cousin, Edward the Black Prince, by whom she became the mother of Richard II.

Kenwigs (Mr), a turner in ivory, and "a monstrous genteel man." He toadies Mr Lillyvick, his wife's uncle, from whom he has "expectations."

Kerns, light-armed Irish foot-soldiers. The word (Kighyren) means "a hell shower," so called because they were hell-rares or the "devil's black-guard" (See GALLOW GLASSES) — Stanhurst, Description of Ireland, viii 28.

Kesche'trouch, the shepherd who joined the six Greek slaves of Ephesus, and was one of the "seven sleepers."

Keschetouch's Dog, Catmer, called by Sale, in his notes to the Koran, "Katsmir" — Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales ("History of Dabianios," 1743).

Kes'teven Lincolnshire is divided into Lansley, the highest lands, Kesteven, the heaths (west), and Holland, the fens.

Quoth Kesteren how I hate
Thus of her fogs fens to hear rude Holland prate I Dryton, Polyolbion xxv (1622)

Kettle of Fish (A Pretty), a pretty muddle, a bad job. A corruption of Kiddle of fish. A kiddle is a basket set in the opening of a weir for catching fish (French, quideau).

Kettle-drum, a corruption of Kiddle-drum, a drum in the shape of a kiddle or basket employed for catching fish (See above).

Kettledrummle (Gabriel), a covener preacher — Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II).

Keuser, one of the rivers of Mahomet's paradise, the waters whereof are sweeter than new milk.

He who has seen the garden of thy beauty O adorable princess would not change his ravishment for a draught of the water of Keuser — Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales ("The Basket" 1743).

Kevin (St), a young man who went to live on a solitary rock at Glendalough, in Wicklow. This he did to flee from Kath'leen, who loved him, and whose eyes he feared his heart would not be able to resist. Kathleen tracked him, and while he slept "bent over him," but, starting from his sleep, the "hoary man" cast the girl from the rock into the sea, which her ghost haunted amidst the sounds of sweet music — T Moore, Irish Melodies, iv ("By that Lake" 1814).

Key (St), son of sir Ector the foster-father of prince Arthur. He was Arthur's seneschal, and is represented as rude and boistful. Sir Gaw'ain is the type of courtesy, sir Lancelot of chivalry, sir Mordred of treachery, sir Galahad of chastity, sir Mark of cowardice (See KAY).

Key and Bible, used for the detection of thieves. A key is placed over an open Bible at the words, "Whither thou goest, I will go" (Ruth i 16), and, the fingers of the person being held so as to form a cross, the text is repeated. The names of suspected persons are then pronounced in succession, and when the name of the thief is uttered, the key jumps and dances about. An instance of this method of thief-finding was brought before the magistrates at the borough petty sessions at Ludlow, in January, 1879.

A married woman named Mary Ann Collier was charged with using abusive and insulting language to her neighbour Eliza Oliver and the complainant, in her statement to the magistrates said that on December 27 she was engaged in carrying water when Mrs. Collier stopped her and stated that another neighbour had had a sheet stolen and had turned the key on the Bible near several houses that when it came to her (Oliver's) house the key moved of itself and that when complainant's name was mentioned the key and the Book turned completely round and fell out of their hands. She also stated that the owner of the sheet then inquired from the key and the Book whether the theft was committed at dark or daylight, and the reply was daylight. Defendant then called complainant A — a daylight thief "and charged her with stealing the sheet. — Leicester paper paragraph (January, 1879).

Key of Russia, Smolensk, on the Dnieper famous for its resistance to Napoleon I in 1812.

Key of the Mediterranean, the fortress of Gibraltar, which commands the entrance of the Mediterranean Sea.

Keys of Knowledge Five things are known to God alone (1) The time of the day of judgment, (2) the time of rain, (3) the sex of an animal before birth, (4) what will happen on the morrow, (5) where any one will die. These the Arabs call the five keys of secret knowledge—Sale, Al Koran, xxxi note

* * The five senses are called "The five doors of knowledge"

Keyne [Keen] or ST KEYNA, daughter of Braganus prince of Gorthmatrin or Brecon, called "Keyna the Virgin". Her sister Melaria was the mother of St David. Many nobles sought her in marriage, but she refused them all, being resolved to live and die a virgin. She retired to a spot near the Severn, which abounded with serpents, but at her prayer they were all turned into Ammonites, and "abide to this day." Subsequently, she removed to Mount St Michael, and by her prayer a spring of healing waters burst out of the earth, and whoever drinks first of this water after marriage will become the dominant house-power. "Now," says Southey, "a Cornishman took his bride to church, and the moment the ring was on ran up the mount to drink of the mystic water. Down he came in full glee to tell his bride, but the bride said, 'My good man, I brought a bottle of the water to church with me, and drank of it before you started!'"—Southey, The Well of St Keyne (1798)

Khadjah, daughter of Khowaileid, Mahomet's first wife, and one of the four perfect women. The other three are Fatima, the prophet's daughter, Mary, daughter of Imran, and Asia, wife of the Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea.

Khawla, one of the sorceresses in the caves of Dom-Daniel, "under the roots of the ocean." She is called "the woman-fiend," "fiercest of the enchanter brood." She had heard that one of the race of Hodeirah (3 syl) would be their destruction, so Okba was sent forth to cut off the whole race. He succeeded in killing eight, but one named Thal'aba escaped. Abdaldar was chosen to hunt him up and kill him. He found the boy in an Arab's tent, and raised the dagger, but ere the blow fell, the murderer himself was killed by the death-angel.—Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer (1797)

Khud'ir or CHIDDER, the tutelary god of voyagers, his brother Elias is the tutelary god of travellers. The two brothers meet once a year at Mina, near Mecca.—Mouradgea d'Ohsson, History of the Ottoman Empire (1821)

Khorassan (The Veiled Prophet of), Mokanna, a prophet-chief, who wore a veil under pretence of shading the dazzling light of his countenance. The truth is, he had lost an eye, and his face was otherwise disfigured in battle. Mokanna assumed to be a god, and maintained that he had been Adam, Noah, and other representative men. When the sultan Mahadi envied him so that escape was impossible, the prophet poisoned all his followers at a banquet, and then threw himself into a burning acid which wholly consumed his body.—T Moore, Lalla Rookh ("The Veiled Prophet, etc.," 1817)

Kidney A man of another kidney, a man of a different sort of character. The Greeks, Romans, Jews, etc., supposed the kidneys to be the seat of the affections, and therefore to determine the character.

Kifri, a giant and enchanter, the impersonation of atheism and blasphemy. After some frightful blasphemies, he hurls into the air a huge rock, which falls on himself and kills him, "for self-murderers are generally infidels or atheists"—Sir C Morell [J Ridley], Tales of the Genu ("The Enchanter's Tale," vi, 1751)

Kil, in the names of places, means a "cell, cloister, or chapel."

Kilbarchan (Scotland), Kil-bara-cm, the kill on the hill-top.

Kilcarr (Ireland), the little kil.

Kildare is Kil-dara, the "kil of the oak." St Bridget built her first cell under a large oak.

Kilham (Yorkshire), the chapel close. Kilkenny, the kill or cloister of St Kenny or Canice.

Kilmore (Ireland), the big kil.

Kilsyth (Ireland), the great 'kil' ("sythe," great).

Icolmkil (Scotland), is I-columb-kil, i.e. the "island of St Columba's cell." The Culdee institutions of St Columba were established in 563, for the purpose of converting the Picts to Christianity.

Kildare (2 syl), famous for the fire of St Bridget, which was never allowed to go out. St Bridget returns every twentieth year to tend to the fire herself. Part of the chapel of St Bridget still remains, and is called "The Fire-house."

Like the bright lamp that shines in darkness & light,
And burns as through the ages of darkness and night.
T. Moore, Irish Melodies c. ("Ere, O Ere" 1832)

Apud Kildarum occurit una Summa Beata cum
ll. 34 (1187).

Kilderkin (Nod), keeper of an eating-house at Greenwich—Sir W. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.)

Kilian (St), an Irish missionary who suffered martyrdom at Würzburg, in 689. A cathedral was erected to his memory in the eighth century.

Kilian of Kersberg, the 'squire of Sir Archibald von Hagenbach—Sir W. Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

Killed by Kindness It is said that the ape not unfrequently strangles its young ones by hugging them too hard.

The Athenians, wishing to show honour to Draco the law-giver, showered on him their caps and cloaks, and he was smothered to death by the pile thus heaped upon him.

Killing no Murder Carpentier de Maigny, the enemy of Mazarin, issued, in 1658, a tract entitled Tuer un Tyran n'est par un Crime.

Serbv wrote a tract entitled Killing no Murder, generally thought to have been the production of William Allan. The object of the book was to show that it would be no crime to murder Cromwell.

Kilmansegg (Miss), an heiress with great expectations, and an artificial leg of solid gold—Thomas Hood, A Golden Legend (1828).

King, a title of sovereignty or honour. At one time, crown tenants were called kings or dukes, at the option of the sovereign; thus, Frederick Barbarossa made one of his brothers a king-vassal, and another a duke-vassal, simply by the investiture of a sword. In English history, the lord of Man was styled "king," so was the lord of the Isle of Wight, and the lord of Connaught, as clearly appears in the grants of John and Henry III. Several examples might be quoted of earls conferring the title of "king" on their vassals—See Selden's Titles of Honour, iii. (1614).

King (Like a) When Porus the Indian prince, was taken prisoner Alexander asked him how he expected to be treated. "Like a king," he replied—and Alexander made him his friend.

King (The Factory) Richard Carter of B-road, the sumptuous abode of the 'Ten Hours Bill' (1788-89).

Credo ut Persam nunc propter rubra tegumenta capitis Pubicum Caput vocant, ita reges Moscovice, propter alba tegumenta Alba Reges appellari.—Sigismund.

King (The Snow), Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, killed in the 'Thirty Years War' at the battle of Lützen, 1632.

At Vienna he was called 'The Snow King'—in German. Like a snow-ball, he was kept together by the cold, but as he approached a warmer soil he melted away and disappeared.—Dr. Ouchon Scandinavia, ll. 51 (1858).

* * Sweden and Norway are each called "The Snow Kingdom."

Let no vessel of the kingdom of snow ('erway), bound on the dark rolling waves of Inletore (the Orkney)—O. L. An. Angla l.

King (The White) The ancient kings of Muscovy were so called from the white robe which they used to wear. Solomon wore a white robe, hence our Lord, speaking of the lilies of the field, says that "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these" (Luke xii. 27).

Principum Moscovice Albus Regem nuncupant, Credo ut Persam nunc propter rubra tegumenta capitis Pubicum Caput vocant, ita reges Moscovice, propter alba tegumenta Alba Reges appellari.—Sigismund.

* * Another explanation may be suggested. Muscovy was called "White Russia," as Poland was called "Black Russia." See WHITE QUARRY, p. 806.

King (Tom), "the choice spirit of the day for a quiz, a hoax, a joke, a jest, a song, a dance, a race, or a row. A jolly dog, a rare blood, prime buck, rum soul, and funny fellow." He drives M. Morebleu, a French barber, living in the Seven Dials, London, almost out of his senses by inquiring over and over again for Mr. Thompson.—Moneroff, Mon Tonsor.

Otto III of Germany (980, 983-1002)

King (surnamed the Young), Dagobert II of France (652, 656-679)

Leo II pope (470, 474-474)

Louis VII le Jeune, of France (1120, 1137-1180)

Ludwig II of Germany (822, 855-875)

Romanus II emperor of the East (939, 959-963)

King Franco'sni, Joachim Murat, so called because his dress was so exceedingly showy that he reminded one of the fine dresses of Franconi the mountebank (1767-1815)

King Log, a roi fainéant, an allusion to the fable of the Frogs asking for a King Jupiter threw a log into the pond for their first king, and a stork for their second. The one was too passive, the other was a "devourer of his people"

King Maker (The), Richard Neville, earl of Warwick, who fell in the battle of Barnet (1420-1471). So called because when he espoused the Yorkists, Edward IV was set up king, and when he espoused the Lancastrian side, Henry VI was restored

Thus fortune to his end the mighty Warwick brings
This puissant setter up and plucker-down of kings.
Dryden Polyolbion xiii. (1622)

King Pétaud, a king whose subjects are all his equals. The court of King Pétaud is a board where no one pays any attention to the chairman, a meeting of all talkers and no hearers. The king of the beggars is called king Pétaud, from the Latin, peto, "I beg"

King Stork, a tyrant who devours his subjects and makes them submissive from fear. The allusion is to the fable of the Frogs asking for a King. Jupiter first sent them a log, but they despised the passive thing, he then sent them a stork, who devoured them.—Æsop

King and the Locusts. A king made a proclamation that, if any man would tell him a story which should last for ever, he would make him his heir and son-in-law, but if any one undertook to do so and failed, he should lose his head. After many failures, came one, and said, "A certain king seized all the corn of his kingdom, and stored it in a huge granary, but a swarm of locusts came, and a small cranny was deserted, through which one locust could contrive to creep. So one locust went in, and carried off one grain of corn, and then another locust went in, and carried off another grain of corn, and then another locust went in," etc., and so the man went on, day after day, and week after week, "and so another locust went in, and carried off another grain of corn." A month passed, a year passed. In six months more, the king said, "How much longer will the locusts be?" "Oh, your majesty," said the story-teller, "they have cleared at present only a cubit, and there are many thousand cubits in the granary "Man, man!" cried the king, "you will drive me mad Take my daughter, take my kingdom, take everything I have, only let me hear no more of these intolerable boasts!"—Letters from an Officer in India (edited by the Rev S A Pears)

King and the Beggar It is said that king Copethua or Cophetua of Africa fell in love with a beggar-girl, and married her The girl's name was Penel'ophoa, called by Shakespeare Zenel'ophon (Love's Labour's Lost, act iv sc 1, 1591)

King and the Cobbler The interview between Henry VIII and a merry London cobbler is the subject of one of the many popular tales in which Bluff Hal is represented as visiting a humble subject in disguise

King of Bark, Christopher III of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden So called because, in a time of scarcity, he had the bark of birchwood mixed with meal for food (died 1448)

King of Bath, Beau Nash, who was for fifty-six years master of the ceremonies of the bath-rooms in that city, and conducted the balls with great splendour and judgment (1674-1761)

King of England. This title was first assumed by Egbert in 828

King of Exeter 'Change, Thomas Clark, friend of the famous Abraham Newland (1737-1817)

King of France This title was first assumed by Louis VII (1171) It was changed into "king of the French" by the National Assembly in 1789 Louis XVIII resumed the title "king of France" in 1814, and Louis Philippe again resumed the more republican title, "king of the French" (1830)

King of France Edward III of England assumed the title in 1337, but in 1801 it was relinquished by proclamation (time, George III)

King of Ireland. This title was first assumed by Henry VIII in 1542 The title previously assumed by the kings of England was "lord of Ireland"

King of Painters, a title assumed by Parrhasios Plutarch says he wore a purple robe and a golden crown (fl B C 400)

King of Preachers, Louis Bourdaloue, a French clergyman (1632-1704)

King of Rome, a title conferred by Napoleon I on his son the very day he was born, but he was generally called the duke of Reichstadt

It is thought that this title was given in imitation of Charlemagne If so, it was a blunder, Charlemagne was never "king of Rome," but he was "patrician of Rome" In the German empire, the emperor-elect was "king of the Romans," not "king of Rome," and, after being crowned by the pope, was styled "emperor of the Romans," and from 962 "kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire" After the reign of Frederick II, the second consecration was dispensed with

King of Ships, Carausius, who assumed the purple in A D 287, and, seizing on Britain, defeated the emperor Maximian Herulus in several naval engagements (250, 287-293)

King of Yvetot [Yv-to], a king of name only, a mockery king, one who assumes mighty honours without the wherewithal to support them Yvetot, near Rouen, was a seigneurie, on the possessor of which Clotaire I conferred the title of king in 534, and the title continued till the fourteenth century

Il était en roi d'Yvetot
Peu connu dans l'histoire
Se levant tard se couchant tôt
Dormant fort bien sans gloire

Déranger

King of the Beggars, Bampfylde Moore Carew (1693-1770) He succeeded Clause Patch, who died 1730, and was therefore king of the beggars for forty years (1730-1770)

King of the World, the Roman emperor

King Sat on the Rocky Brow (A) The reference is to Xerxes viewing the battle of Salamis from one of the declivities of mount Agli'cos

A king sat on the rocky brow

("Ships by thousands" is a gross exaggeration The original fleet was only 1200 sail, and 400 were wrecked off the coast of Sepsis before the sea-fight of Salamis commenced, thus reducing the number to 800 at most)

King should Die Standing (A) Vespasian said so, and Louis XVIII of France repeated the same conceit Both died standing

King's Cave (The), opposite to Campbelltown (Argvylshire), so called because king Robert Bruce with his retinue lodged in it — Statistical Account of Scotland, v 167

King's Chair, the hands of two persons so crossed as to form a seat On Candlemas Day (February 2), it was at one time customary for Scotch children to carry offerings to their schoolmaster, and the boy and girl who brought the richest gift were elected king and queen for the nonce When school was dismissed, each of these two children was carried in a king's chair, by way of triumph

Kings Many lines of kings have taken the name of some famous forefather or some founder of a dynasty as a titular name — See Selden, Titles of Honour, v

Alban kings, called Silvius
Amalekite kings, Agag
Bithynian kings, Nicomédès

Kings of Cologne (The Three), the three Magi who came from the East to offer gifts to the infant Jesus Their names are Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthazar The first offered gold, symbolic of kingship, the second, frankincense, symbolic of divinity, the third, myrrh, symbolic of death, myrrh being used in embalming the dead (See COLOGNE, p 204)

Kings of England. Since the Conquest, not more than three successive sovereigns have reigned without a crisis

William I, William II, Henry I

Stephen usurper

Henry II, Richard I, John

The pope gives the crown to the dauphin.

Henry III, Edward I, Edward II

Edward II. murdered.

Edward III, Richard II

Richard II. deposed

Henry IV, V, VI

Lancaster changed to York.

Edward IV, V, Richard III

Dynasty changed.

Henry VII, VIII, Edward VI

Lady Jane Grey

Mary, Elizabeth

Dynasty changed.

James I, Charles I

Charles I. beheaded.

Charles II, James II

James II. dethroned.

William III, Anne

Dynasty changed.

George I, II, III

Regency

George IV, William IV, Victoria (indirect successions)

Kings of England Except in one instance (that of John), we have never had a great-grandchild sovereign in direct descent The exception is not creditable for in John's reign the kingdom was given away twice, his son Henry III was imprisoned by Leicester, and his great-grandson Edward II was murdered In two other instances a grandchild has succeeded, viz, Henry VI, whose reign was a continued civil war, and Edward VI, the sickly son of Jane Seymour Stephen was a grandchild of William I, but a usurper, Richard II was a grandchild of Edward III, and George III was grandson of George II, but their fathers did not succeed to the throne

William I, his sons, William II, Henry I

Stephen (a usurper)

Henry II, his sons, Richard I, John (disrowned)

From John, in regular succession, we have Henry III (imprisoned), Edward I, Edward II (murdered), Edward III

Richard II, son of the Black Prince, and without offspring

Henry IV, Henry V, Henry VI (civil wars)

Edward IV, Edward V

Richard III (no offspring)

Henry VII, Henry VIII, Edward VI

Mary, Elizabeth (daughters of Henry VIII)

James I, Charles I

Cromwell (called lord protector)

Charles II, James II (two brothers)

William III

Anne
 George I, George II
 George III (great-grandson of George I, but not in direct descent), George IV
 William IV (brother of George IV)
 Victoria (the niece of William IV and George IV)

Kings of England Three seems to be a kind of ruling number in our English sovereigns. Besides the coincidences mentioned above connected with the number, may be added the following — (1) That of the four kings who married French princesses, three of them suffered violent deaths, viz, Edward II, Richard II, and Charles I. (2) The three longest reigns have been three threes, viz, Henry III, Edward III, and George III. (3) We have no instance, as in France, of three brothers succeeding each other.

Kings of France The French have been singularly unfortunate in their choice of royal surnames, when designed to express anything except some personal quality, as handsome, fat, of which we cannot judge the truth. Thus, Louis VIII, a very feeble man in mind and body, was surnamed the Lion, Philippe II, whose whole conduct was overreaching and selfish, was the Magnanimous, Philippe III, the tool of Labrosse, was the Daring, Philippe VI, the most unfortunate of all the kings of France, was surnamed the Lucky, Jean, one of the worst of all the kings, was called the Good, Charles VI an idiot, and Louis XV a scandalous debauchee, were surnamed the Well-beloved, Henri II, a man of pleasure, wholly under the thumb of Diane de Poitiers, was called the Warlike, Louis XIII, most unjust in domestic life, where alone he had any freedom of action, was called the Just, Louis XIV, a man of mere ceremony and posture, who lost battle after battle, and brought the nation to absolute bankruptcy, was surnamed the Great King (He was little in stature, little in mind, little in all moral and physical faculties, and great only in such little-nesses as posturing, dressing, ceremony, and gormandizing). And Louis XVIII, forced on the nation by conquerors quite against the general will, was called the Deserved.

Kings of France The succession of three brothers has been singularly fatal in French monarchism. The Capetian dynasty terminated with three brothers, sons of Philippe le Bel (viz, Louis X, Philippe V, and Charles IV). The Valois dynasty came to an end by the succession of the three brothers, sons of Henri II (viz, François II, Charles IX, and Henri III). The next or Bourbon dynasty terminated in the same manner (Louis XVI, Louis XVIII, and Charles X).

After Charles IV (the third brother of the Capetian dynasty), came Philippe de Valois, a collateral descendant, after Henri III (the third brother of the Valois dynasty), came Henry de Bourbon, a collateral descendant, and after Charles X (the third brother of the Bourbon dynasty), came Louis Philippe, a collateral descendant. With the third of the third the monarchy ended.

Kings Playing with their Children

The fine painting of Bonington represents Henri IV (of France) carrying his children pickaback, to the horror of the Spanish ambassador.

Plutarch tells us that Agesildos was one day discovered riding cock-horse on a walking-stick, to please and amuse his children.

George III was on one occasion discovered on all fours, with one of his children riding astride his back. He is also well remembered by the painting of "George III Playing at Ball with the Princess Amelia."

Kingdom of Snow, Norway
 Sweden also is so called. When these kingdoms had each a separate king, either of them was called "The Snow King" (See KING, SNOW).

Let no vessel of the kingdom of snow bound on the dark rolling waves of Inistore [the Orkneys].—Osian Fingal I.

Kingsale (Lord), allowed to wear his hat in the presence of royalty. In 1203, Hugh de Lacie treacherously seized sir John de Courcy lord of Kingsale, and king John condemned him to perpetual imprisonment in the Tower. When he had been there about a year, king John and Philippe Auguste of France agreed to determine certain claims by combat. It was then that John applied to De Courcy to be his champion, and as soon as the giant knight entered the lists, the French champion ran away panic-struck. John now asked his champion what reward he could give him for his service. "Titles and estates I have now," said De Courcy, and then requested that after having paid obedience, he and his heirs might stand covered in the presence of the king and his successors

Lord Forester had the same right confirmed to him by Henry VIII

John Pakington, ancestor of lord Hampton, had a grant made him in the 20th Henry VIII "of full liberty during his life to wear his hat in the royal presence"

Kingship (Disqualifications for) Any personal blemish disqualified a person from being king during the semi-barbarous stage of society, thus putting out the eyes of a prince, to disqualify him from reigning, was by no means uncommon. It will be remembered that Hubert designed to put out the eyes of prince Arthur, with this object. Witiza the Visigoth put out the eyes of Theodored, "inhabilitandole para la monarchia," says Ferreras. When Albuquerque took possession of Ormuz, he deposed fifteen kings of Portugal, and, instead of killing them, put out their eyes

Yorwerth, son of Owen Gwynedd, was set aside from the Welsh throne because he had a broken nose

Count Oliva of Barcelona was set aside because he could not speak till he had stamped thrice with his foot, like a goat

The son of Henry V was to be received as king of France, only on condition that his body was without defect, and was not stunted — Monstrelet, Chronique, v. 190 (1512)

Un Conde de Galicia que fuera tallado
Peayro a nombre ome lo desforzado
Perdio la vision, andaba embozado
Ca ome que non vede, non d' b'le aver nado.
Gonzalez de Berceo. E. Dom. 253 (died 1257)

Kinmont Willie, William Armstrong of Kinmonth. This notorious freebooter, who lived in the latter part of the sixteenth century, is the hero of a famous Scotch ballad

Kinoce'tus, a precious stone, which will enable the possessor to cast out devils — Mirror of Stones

Kirk (Mr John), foreman of the jury on Effie Deans's trial. — Sir W. Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.)

Kirkcaldy (Scotland), a corruption of Kirk-Culdee, one of the churches founded in 563 by St Columba and his twelve brethren, when they established the Culdee institutions. The doctrines, discipline, and government of the Culdees resembled presbyterianism

Kirkrapine (3 syl.), a sturdy thief,

"went to rob churches of their ornaments and poor men's boxes." All he could lay hands on he brought to the hut of Abess, daughter of Corceca. While Una was in the hut, Kirkrapine knocked at the door, and as it was not immediately opened, knocked it down, whereupon the lion sprang on him, "under his lordly foot did him suppress," and then "rent him in thousand pieces small"

The meaning is that popery was reformed by the British lion, which slew Kirkrapine, or put a stop to the traffic in spiritual matters. Una represents truth or the Reformed Church — Spenser, Fairy Queen, l. 3 (1590)

Kiss the Scavenger's Daughter (To), to be put to the torture. Strictly speaking, "the scavenger's daughter" was an instrument of torture invented by William Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Henry VIII. Skevington became corrupted into scavenger, and the invention was termed his daughter or offspring

Kit [NUMBER], the lad employed to wait on little Nell, and do all sorts of odd jobs at the "curiosity shop" for her grandfather. He generally begins his sentences with "Why then." Thus, "I was a long way, wasn't it, Kit?" "Why then, it was a goodish stretch," returned Kit. "Did you find the house easily?" "Why then, not over and above," said Kit. "Of course you have come back hungry?" "Why then, I do think I am rather so." When the "curiosity shop" was broken up by Quilp, Kit took service under Mr Garland, Abel Cottage, Finchley

Kit was a shock-headed chumbling awkward lad with an uncommonly wide mouth, very red cheeks, a turned-up nose, and a most comical expression of face. He stopped short at the door on seeing a stranger, twisted in his hand an old round hat without a vestige of brim, and looking with a most extraordinary leer. He was evidently the comedy of little Nell's life. — G. Dickens, The Old Currier p. 57 op. 1 (1847)

Kite (Sergeant), the "recruiting officer." He describes his own character thus

I was born a gipsy and bred among that crew till I was 10 years old, there I learnt canting and lying. I was bought from my mother by a certain noblemen for three pistoles who made me his page, there I learnt impudence and pimping. Being turned off for wearing my lord's linnen and drinking my lady's ratafia, I turned ballad-seller. There I learnt bullying and swearing. I ran into the army and there I learnt drinking. So that the whole sum is canting lying, impudence, pimping, bullying, swearing, drinking and a halberd. — G. Farquhar, The Recruiting Officer III. 1 (1706)

Kitely (2 syl), a rich City merchant, extremely jealous of his wife — Ben Jonson, I terry Man in His Humour (1598)

Kit-Cat Club, held in Shire Lane, now called Lower Serle's Place (London) The members were whig "patriots," who, at the end of William III's reign, met to secure the protestant succession Joseph Addison, Steele, Congreve, Garth, Vanbrugh, Mainwaring, Walpole, Pulteney, etc., were members

Kit-Cat Pictures, forty-two portraits, painted by sir Godfrey Kneller, three-quarter size, to suit the walls of Tonson's villa at Barn Elms, where, in its latter days, the Kit-Cat Club was held

* * "Kit-Cat" derives its name from Christopher Cat, a pastry-cook, who served the club with mutton pies

Kitt Henshaw, boatman of sir Patrick Charteris of Kinfauns, provost of Perth — Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Kittlecourt (Sir Thomas), M P, neighbour of the laird of Ellangowan — Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Kitty, one of the servants of Mr Peregrine Lovel She spoke French like a native, because she was once "a half-boarder at Chelsea" Being asked if she had read Shakespeare "Shakspear, Shakspear!" she replied "Who wrote it? No, I never read that book, but I promise to read it over one afternoon or other" — Rev James Townley, High Life Below Stairs (1759)

Kitty, younger daughter of sir David and lady Dunder of Dunder Hall, near Dover She is young, wild, and of exuberant spirits, "her mind full of fun, her eyes full of fire, her head full of novels, and her heart full of love" Kitty fell in love with Random at Calais, and agreed to clope with him, but the fugitives were detected by sir David during their preparations for flight, and, to prevent scandal, the marriage was sanctioned by the parents, and duly solemnized at Dunder Hall — G Colman, Ways and Means (1788)

Kitty Pry, the waiting-maid of Melissa Very impertinent, very inquisitive, and very free in her tongue

She has a partiality to Timothy Sharp "the lying valet" — Garrick, The Lying Valet (1741)

Klaus (Doctor), hero and title of a comedy by Herr Adolph l'Arronge (1878) Dr Klaus is a gruff, but noble-minded and kind-hearted man, whose niece (a rich jeweller's daughter) has married a poor nobleman of such extravagant notions that the wife's property is soon dissipated, but the young spendthrift is reformed The doctor has a coachman, who invades his master's province, and undertakes to cure a sick peasant.

Klaus (Peter), the prototype of Rip van Winkle Klaus [Klows] is a goat-herd of Sittendorf, who was one day neccosted by a young man, who beckoned him to follow Peter obeyed, and was led into a deep dell, where he found twelve knights playing skittles, no one of whom uttered a word Gazing around, he noticed a can of wine, and, drinking some of its contents, was overpowered with sleep When he awoke, he was amazed at the height of the grass, and when he entered the village everything seemed strange to him One or two companions encountered him, but those whom he knew as boys were grown middle-aged men, and those whom he knew as middle-aged were grey-headed After much perplexity, he discovered he had been asleep for twenty years (See SLEEPERS)

Your Epimenides your somnolent Peter Klaus since named Rip van Winkle — T Carlyle.

Kleiner (Général), governor of Prague, brave as a lion, but tender-hearted as a girl. It was Kleiner who rescued the infant daughter of Mahidenau at the siege of Magdeburg. A soldier seized the infant's nurse, but Kleiner smote him down, saved the child, and brought it up as his own daughter, Mahidenau being imprisoned in Pragno as a spy, Meeta his daughter came to Prague to beg for his pardon, and it then came to light that the governor's adopted daughter was Meeta's sister.—S Knowles, The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838)

Knag (Miss), forewoman of Mde Mantalinn, milliner, near Cavendish Square, London. After doting on Kate Nickleby for three whole days, this spiteful creature makes up her mind to hate her for ever.—C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, xviii (1838)

Knights of Windsor, formerly called "Poor Knights of Windsor," but now entitled "The Military Knights of Windsor," a body of military pensioners, who have their residence within the precincts of Windsor Castle

Knights of the Bath, an order of knighthood derived from the ancient Franks, and so termed because the members originally "bathed" before they performed their vigils The last knights created in this ancient form were at the coronation of Charles II in 1661

G C B stands for Grand Cross of the Bath (the first class), K C B for Knight Commander of the Bath (the second class), and C B for Companion of the Bath (the third class)

Knights of the Blood of Our Saviour, an order of knighthood in Mantua, instituted by duke Vincent Gonzaga in 1608, on his marriage It consisted of twenty Mantuan dukes The name originated in the belief that in St Andrew's Church, Mantua, certain drops of our Saviour's blood are preserved as a relic

tuted by St Louis (IX) of France on his marriage. The collar was decorated with broom flowers, intermixed with fleurs de lys in gold. The motto was Exaltat humiles.

Knights of the Carpet or CARPET KNIGHTS, i.e. non-military or civil knights, such as mayors, lawyers, authors, artists, physicians, and so on, who receive their knighthood kneeling on a carpet, and not in the tented field.

Knights of the Chamber or CHAMBER KNIGHTS, knights bachelors made in times of peace in the presence chamber, and not in the camp. These are always military men, and therefore differ from "Carpet Knights," who are always civilians.

Knights of the Cock and Dog, founded by Philippe I, Auguste, of France.

Knights of the Crescent, a military order, instituted by Renatus of Anjou, king of Sicily, etc., in 1448. So called from the badge, which is a crescent of gold enamelled. What gave rise to this institution was that Renatus took for his device a crescent, with the word lor ("praise"), which, in the style of Jobus, makes lor in crescent, i.e. "by advancing in virtue one merits praise."

Knights of the Dove, a Spanish order, instituted in 1379 by John I of Castile.

Knights of the Dragon, created by the emperor Sigismund in 1417, upon the condemnation of Huss and Jerome of Prague "the heretics."

Knights of the Ermine (Chevaliers de l'Ordre de l'Ermine), instituted in 1450 by François I, duc de Bretagne. The collar was of gold, composed of ears of corn in saltire, at the end of which hung an ermine, with the legend a ma vie. The order expired when the dukedom was annexed to the crown of France.

Knights of the Garter, instituted by Edward III of England in 1344. According to Selden, "it exceeds in majesty, honour, and fame, all chivalrous orders in the world." The story is that Joan countess of Salisbury, while dancing with the king, let fall her garter, and the gallant Edward, perceiving a smile on the face of the courtiers, picked it up, bound it round his own knee, and exclaimed, "Honi soit qui mal y pense."

The blue garter and the motto of the order are thus accounted for.

Knights of the Golden Fleece, a military order of knighthood, instituted by Philippe le Bon of Burgundy in 1429. It took its name from a representation of the golden fleece on the collar of the order. The king of Spain is grand-master, and the motto is Ante feret quam flamma micet.

Knights of the Golden Shield, an order instituted by Louis II of France, for the defence of the country. The motto is Allons (i.e. "Let us go in defence of our country").

Knights of the Hare, an order of twelve knights, instituted by Edward III while he was in France. The French raised a tremendous shout, and Edward thought it was the cry of battle, but it was occasioned by a hare running between the two armies. From this incident the knights created on the field after this battle were termed "Knights of the Order of the Hare."

Knights of the Holy Ghost (Chevaliers de l'Ordre du Saint Esprit), instituted by Henri III of France on his return from Poland. Henri III was both born and crowned on Whit-Sunday, and hence the origin of the order.

Knights of the Holy Sepulchre, an order of knighthood founded by St Helena, when she visited Jerusalem at the age of 80, and found (as it is said) the cross on which Christ was crucified in a cavern under the temple of Venus, A.D. 328. This order was confirmed by pope Pascal II in 1114.

Knights of the Lily, an order of knighthood in Navarre, founded by Garcia in 1048.

Knights of the Order of Fools, established November, 1381, and continued to the beginning of the sixteenth century. The insignia was a jester or fool embroidered on the left side of their mantles, cap and bells, yellow stockings, a cup of fruit in the right hand, and a gold key in the left. It resembled the "Oddfellows" of more modern times.

Knights of the Porcupine (Chevaliers de l'Ordre du Porc-épine), a French order of knighthood. The original motto was Communis et cernuus, changed by Louis XII into Ultus avos Troja.

Knights of the Red Staff, an order instituted by Alfonso XI of Castile and Leon in 1330

Knights of the Round Table King Arthur's knights were so called, because they sat with him at a round table made by Merlin for king Leodegrance. This king gave it to Arthur on his marriage with Guinever, his daughter. It contained seats for 150 knights, 100 of which king Leodegrance furnished when he sent the table

Knights of the Shell The argonauts of St. Nicholas were so called from the shells worked on the collar of the order

Knights of the Ship, an order of knighthood founded by St. Louis (IX) of France in his expedition to Egypt.

Knights of the Star (Chevaliers de l'Ordre de l'Etoile), an ancient order of knighthood in France. The motto of the order was Monstrant regibus astra viam

Knights of the Swan (Chevaliers de l'Ordre du Cygne), an order of knighthood founded in 1443 by the elector Frederick II of Brandenburg, and restored in 1843 by Frederick William IV of Prussia. Its object is the relief of distress generally. The king of Prussia is grand-master. The motto is Gott mit uns ("God be with you"), and the collar is of gold. The white swan is the badge of the house of Cleves (Westphalia).

Lord Berners has a novel called The Knight of the Swan (sixteenth century)

Knights of the Thistle, said to be founded by Archaicus king of the Scots in 809, revived in 1540 by James V of Scotland, again in 1687 by James II of Great Britain, and again by queen Anne, who placed the order on a permanent footing. The decoration consists of a collar of enamelled gold, composed of sixteen thistles interlaced with sprigs of rue, and a small golden image of St. Andrew within a circle. The motto is Nemo me impune lacessit. The members are sometimes called "Knights of St. Andrew."

The rue mixed with the thistles is a pun on the word "Andrew," thistles And-rue

* * There was at one time a French "Order of the Thistle" in the house of Bourbon, with the same decoration and motto

ing-glass, an order instituted in 1410 by Ferdinand of Castile

Knights Teutonic, originally called "Knights of St. George," then "Knights of the Virgin Mary," and lastly "Teutonic Knights of the Hospital of St. Mary the Virgin." This order was instituted by Henry king of Jerusalem, in compliment to the German volunteers who accompanied Frederick Barbarossa on his crusade. The knights were soon afterwards placed under the tutelage of the Virgin, to whom a hospital had been dedicated for the relief of German pilgrims, and in 1191 pope Celestine III confirmed the privileges, and changed the name of the order into the "Teutonic Knights," etc. Abolished by Napoleon in 1809 Knighton, groom of the duke of Buckingham—Sir W. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Knockwinnock (Sybil), wife of sir Richard of the Redhand, and mother of Malcolm Misbegot—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.)

Know Not to know me argues yourself unknown. The words of Satan to Zephon and Ithuriel, when they discovered him lurking in the garden of Eden—Milton, Paradise Lost, iv 830 (1665)

Kochla'ni, a race of Arabian horses, whose genealogy for 2000 years has been most strictly preserved. They are derived from Solomon's studs. This race of horses can bear the greatest fatigue, can pass days without food, show undaunted courage in battle, and when their riders are slain will carry them from the field to a place of safety.—Niebuhr

Koh-i-noor ("mountain of light"), a diamond once called "The Great Mogul." Held in the fourteenth century by the rajah of Malwa. Later it fell into the hands of the sultans of Delhi, after their conquest of Malwa. It belonged in the seventeenth century to Aurungzebe the Great. The shah Jihan sent it to Hortensio Borgio to be cut, but the Venetian lapidary reduced it from 793 carats to 186, and left it dull and lustreless. It next passed into the hands of Aurungzebe's great-grandson, who hid it in his turban. Nadir Shah invited the possessor to a feast, and insisted on changing turbans, "to cement their love," and thus it fell into Nadir's hands, who gave it the name of "Koh-i-noor." It next passed into the hands of Ahmed Shah, founder of the Cabul dynasty, was extorted from Shah Shuja by Runjet Singh, who wore it set in a bracelet. After the murder of Shu Singh, it was deposited in the Lahore treasury, and after the annexation of the Punjab was presented to Queen Victoria in 1849. It has been recut, and, though reduced to 106 carats, is supposed to be worth £140,000.

* * There is another diamond of the same name belonging to the Shah of Persia.

Kohlhaas (Michael), an excellent historical novel of the Lutheran period, by Henry Kleist, a German (1776-1811).

Kolao, the wild man of Misamis. He had a son who died in early youth, and he went to Pat-Koot-Parout to crave his son's restoration to life. Pat-Koot-Parout put the soul of the dead boy in a leather bag, which he fastened with pickthread, and hung round the neck of Kolao, telling him to lay the body in a new hut, put the bag near the mouth, and so let the soul return to it, but on no account to open the bag before everything was ready. Kolao placed the bag in his wife's hands while he built the hut, strictly enjoining her not to open it, but curiosity led her to open the bag, and out flew the soul to the country of Pat-Koot-Parout again. — T. S. Guelette, Chinese Tales ("Kolao, the Wild Man," 1723).

* * Orpheus, having lost his wife Eurydice by the bite of a serpent, obtained permission of Pluto for her restoration, provided he looked not back till he reached the upper world. He had got to the end of his journey when he turned round to see if Pluto had kept his word. As he turned he just caught sight of Eurydice, who was instantly caught back again to the infernal regions.

Koppenberg, the mountain of Westphalia to which the pied piper (Bunting) led the children, when the people of Hameln refused to pay him for killing their rats.

* * The Old Man of the Mountain led the children of Loreh into the Tannenberg, for a similar offence.

Korrigans or *Korrigan*s, nine fays of Brittany, who can predict future events, assume any shape, and move from place to place as quick as thought. They do not exceed two feet in height, sing like syrens, and comb their long hair like mermaids. They haunt fountains, flee at the sound of bells, and their breath is deadly. — Breton Mythology.

Kosciusko (Thaddeus), the Polish general, who contended against the allied army of Russia under the command of Suwarow, in 1794. He was taken prisoner and sent to Russia, but in 1796 was set at liberty by the czar.

Hope for a season bade the world farewell,
And Freedom shrieked—as Kosciusko fell.
Campbell, Pleasures of Hope I. (1.89).

Krakamal, the Danish death-song.

Kriemhild [Kriemhild], daughter of Dancrat, and sister of Günther king of Burgundy. She first married Siegfried king of the Netherlands, who was murdered by Hagan. Thirteen years afterwards, she married Etzel (Attila) king of the Huns. Some time after her marriage, she invited Günther, Hagan, and others to visit her, and Hagan slew Etzel's young son. Kriemhild now became a perfect fury, and cut off the head of both Günther and Hagan with her own hand, but was herself slain by Hildebrand. Till the death of Siegfried, Kriemhild was gentle, modest, and lovable, but afterwards she became vindictive, bold, and hateful. — The Nibelungen Lied (by the German minnesingers, twelfth century).

Krook, proprietor of a rag and bone warehouse, where everything seems to be bought and nothing sold. He is a grasping drunkard, who eventually dies of spontaneous combustion. Krook is always attended by a large cat, which he calls "Lady Jane," as uncanny as her master. — C. Dickens, Bleak House (1852).

Krutz'ner, or the "German's Tale," in Miss H. Lee's Canterbury Tales. Lord Byron founded his tragedy of Werner on this tale.

The drama [of Werner] is taken entirely from the German's Tale. [Krutz'ner], published in Lee's Canterbury Tales written by two sisters. I have adopted the characters, plan, and even the language of many parts of the story. — Lord Byron, Preface to Werner (1812).

Kubla Khan. Coleridge says that he composed this fragment from a dream, after reading Purchas's Pilgrimage, a description of Khan Kubla's palace, and he wrote it down on awaking.

Kudrun, called the German Odyssey (thirteenth century), divided into three parts called Hagen, Hilde (2 syl), and Kudrun.

Hagen is the son of Siegebrand king of Irlind, and is carried off by a griffin to a distant island, where three princesses take charge of him. In due time a ship touches on the island, takes all the four to Irlind, and Hagen marries Hilda, the youngest of the three sisters.

Hilda In due time Hilda has a daughter, who is called by the surname, and at a marriageable age she becomes the wife of Hedel king of Friesland.

Kudrun Hilda has two children, Otwein [Ot vine] a son, and Kudrun a daughter. Kudrun is affianced to Herwig, but, while preparing the wedding dresses, is carried off by Hartmut, son of Ludwig king of Normandy. Her father goes in pursuit, but is slain by Ludwig. On reaching Normandy, Gerlinde (3 syl), the queen-mother, treats Kudrun with the greatest cruelty, and puts her to the most menial work, because she refuses to marry her son. At length, succour is at hand. Her lover and brother arrive and slay Ludwig. Gerlinde is just about to put Kudrun to death, when Watt Long-beard rushes in, slays the queen, and rescues Kudrun, who is forthwith married to Herwig her affianced lover.—Author unknown (some of the minnesingers).

Kwa'sind, the strongest man that ever lived, the Hercules of the North American Indians. He could pull up cedars and pines by the roots, and toss huge rocks about like playthings. His wondrous strength was "seated in his crown," and there of course lay his point of weakness, but the only weapon which could injure him was the "blow of the fir tree," a secret known only to the pygmies or Little-folk. This mischievous race, out of jealousy, determined to kill the strong man, and one day, finding him asleep in a boat, pelted him with fir cones till he died, and now, whenever the tempest rages through the forests, and the branches of the trees creak and groan and split, they say "Kwasind is gathering in his fire-wood."

Dear too unto Hiawatha
Was the very strong man Kwasind
He the strongest of all mortals
Longfellow Hiawatha, vi and xviii

Kyrle Elyson de Montalban (Don) or "don Quirleyson de Montalban," brother of Thomas de Montalban, in the romance called Tirante le Blanc, author unknown.

* Dr Warburton, in his essay on the old romances, falls into the strange error of calling this character an "early romance of chivalry." As well might he call Claudius king of Denmark a play of Shakespeare's, instead of a character in the tragedy of Hamlet.

A large quarto dropped at the barber's feet. It was the history of that famous knight Tirante le Blanc. "Pray let me look at that book," said the priest. "we shall find in it a fund of amusement. Here shall we find the famous knight don Kyrle Elyson de Montalban and his brother Thomas. This is one of the most amusing books ever written."—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I 16 (1605).

Lab'arum, the imperial standard carried before the Roman emperors in war. Constantine, having seen a luminous cross in the sky the night before the battle of Saxa Rubra, added the sacred monogram XP (Christos)—Gibbon, Decline and Fall, etc., xx note (1788).

It Browning erroneously calls the word labā'um.

stars would write his will in heaven,
As once when a lab'arum was not deemed
Too much for the old founder of these walls [Constantine].

R. Browning, Paracelsus II

Labe (2 syl), the sorceress-queen of the Island of Enchantments. She tried to change Beder, the young king of Persia, into a halting, one-eyed haeck, but Beder was forewarned, and changed Labe herself into a mare.—Arabian Nights ("Beder and Giauharê").

Labe'rius, a Roman writer of pantomimes, contemporary with Julius Caesar.

Labe'rius would be always sure of more followers than Sophocles.—J. Macpherson Dissertation on Ovidian.

La Creevy (Miss), a little talkative, bustling, cheery miniature-painter. Simple-minded, kind-hearted, and bright as a lark. She marries Tim Linkinwater, the old clerk of the brothers Cheeryble.—C. Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Lackitt (Widow), the widow of an Indian planter. This rich vulgar widow falls in love with Charlotte Weldon, who assumes the dress of a young man and calls herself Mr Weldon. Charlotte even marries the widow, but then informs her that she is a girl in male apparel, engaged to Mr Stanmore. The widow consoles herself by marrying Jack Stanmore.—Thomas Southern, Oriconole (1696).

Lacy (Sir Hugo de), constable of Chester, a crusader

Sir Damian de Lacy, nephew of sir Hugo He marries lady Eveline

Lady of Mercy (Our), an order of knighthood in Spain, instituted in 1218 by James I of Aragon, for the deliverance of Christian captives amongst the Moors. As many as 100 captives were rescued in six years by these knights

Lady of Shalott, a maiden who died for love of Sir Lancelot of the Lake. Tennyson has a poem so entitled

"The story of Llaune, 'the hily maid of Astolat,' in Tennyson's Idylls of the King, is substantially the same

Lady of the Bleeding Heart, Ellen Douglas. The cognizance of the Douglas family is a "bleeding heart"—Sir W. Scott, Lady of the Lake (1810)

Lady of the Lake (A), a harlot (Anglo-Saxon, lac, "a present") A "guinea-fowl" or "guinea-hen" is a similar term

But for the difference marriage makes Takes wives and ladies of the lake"
S. Butler Hudibras III. 1 (1638)

Lady of the Lake (The), Nimue [sic], one of the damsels of the lake, that king Pellinore took to his court. Merlin, in his dotage, fell in love with her, when she heedled him out of all his secrets, and enclosed him in a rock, where he died (pt. 1 60). Subsequently, Nimue married Sir Pelleas (pt. 1 81, 82) (See next art)

So upon a time it happened that Merlin shewed his love to a rock whereas was a great wonder and wrought by enchantment, which went under a stone. So by her subtle craft and wo king she made Merlin go under that stone, and so wrought that he never came o' again. So she departed and left Merlin.—Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur I. 63 (1470)

"Tennyson in his Idylls of the King ('Merlin and Vivien'), makes Vivien the enchantress who wheedled old Merlin out of his secrets, and then, 'in a hollow oak,' she shut him fast, and there 'he lay as dead, and lost to life, and use, and name, and fame.'"

This seems to bear error. At any rate, it is not in accordance with the Mort d'Arthur of Chretien renoué

Lady of the Lake (The), Nineve. It is not evident from the narrative whether Nineve is not the same person as Nimue, and that one of the two (probably the latter) is not a typographical error

Then the Lady of the Lake this was always a matter of King Arthur and good for her subtle craft that King Arthur was like to have been deceived and therefore the Lady of the Lake that might have been called the forest to seek Sir Lancelot du Lake.—Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur I. 67 (1470)

The feasts that underground the fairy did him [Arthur] make,

And there how he enjoyed the Lady of the Lake
Dryden Polyolbon II. (1612).

Lady of the Lake (The) Vivienne (3 syl) is called La Dame du Lac, and dwelt en la marche de la petite Bretagne. She stole Lancelot in his infancy, and plunged with him into her home lake, hence was Lancelot called du Lac. When her protégé was grown to manhood, she presented him to King Arthur

Lady of the Lake (The), Ellen Douglas, once a favourite of King James, but when her father fell into disgrace, she retired with him into the vicinity of Loch Katrine.—Sir W. Scott, Lady of the Lake (1810)

Lady of the Lake and Arthur's Sword. The Lady of the Lake gave to King Arthur the sword "Excalibur" "Well," said she, "go into yonder barge and row yourself to the sword, and take it." So Arthur and Merlin came to the sword that a hand held up, and took it by the handles, and the arm and hand went under the lake again (pt. 1 23)

This Lady of the Lake asked in recompense the head of Sir Balin, because he had slain her brother, but the king refused the request. Then said Balin, "Evil be ye found! Ye would have my head, therefore ye shall lose thine own." So saying, with his sword he smote off her head in the presence of King Arthur.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 23 (1470)

Lady with a Lamp, Florence Nightingale (1820—)

On England's annual
A Lady with a Lamp shall stand
A noble type of good Heroic womanhood.

Longfellow Sarah Flower's

Ladies' Rock, Stirling (Scotland)

In the castle hill is a hollow called The Valley—comprehending about an acre—for jousting and tournaments. (Locally called the Lady's Rock—)

mount called The Ladies Hill, where the fair ones of the court took their station to behold these feats—Alfano History of Stirlingshire 282

Laer'tes (3 syl), son of Polonius lord chamberlain of Denmark, and brother of Ophelia. He is induced by the king to challenge Hamlet to a "friendly" duel, but poisons his own rapier. He wounds Hamlet, and in the scuffle which ensues, the combatants exchange swords, and Hamlet wounds Laer'tes, so that both die—Shakespeare, Hamlet (1596)

Laer'tes (3 syl), a Dane, whose life Gustavus Vasa had spared in battle. He becomes the trusty attendant of Christina, daughter of the king of Sweden, and never proves ungrateful to the noble Swede—H Brooke, Gustavus Vasa (1730)

Laer'tes's Son, Ulysses

But when his strings with mournful magic tell
What dire distress Laer'tes's son befall
The streams, meandering thro' the maze of woe,
Bid sacred sympathy the heart o'erflow
Falconer The Shipwreck, III 1 (1756)

Lafau, an old French lord, sent to conduct Bertram count of Rousillon to the king of France, by whom he was invited to the royal court—Shakespeare, All's Well that Ends Well (1598)

Lafontaine (The Danish), Hans Christian Andersen (1805-1875)

Lafontaine of the Vaudeville
So C F Panard is called (1691-1765)

Lag'ado, capital of Balmibarhi, celebrated for its grand school of projectors, where the scholars have a technical education, being taught to make pineushions from softened granite, to extract from cuneumbers the sunbeams which ripened them, and to convert ice into gunpowder—Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Laputa," 1726)

La Grange and his friend Du Croisy pay their addresses to two young ladies whose heads have been turned by novels. The girls think their manners too natural to be aristocratic, so the gentlemen send to them their lackeys, as "the marquis of Maserille" and "the viscount of Jodelet." The girls are delighted with their "aristocratic visitors," but when the game has been played far enough, the masters enter and unmask the whole trick. By this means the girls are taught a most useful lesson, without suffering any serious ill consequences—Molière, Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

Laila (2 syl), a Moorish maiden, of great beauty and purity, who loved Manuel, a youth worthy of her. The father disapproved of the match, and they eloped, were pursued, and overtaken near a precipice on the Guadalupe (1 syl). They climbed to the top of the precipice, and the father bade his followers discharge their arrows at them. Laila and Manuel, seeing death to be inevitable, threw themselves from the precipice, and perished in the fall. It is from this incident that the rock was called "The Lovers' Leap."

And every Moorish maid can tell
Where Laila lies who loved so well
And every youth who passes there
Says for Manuel's soul a prayer

Southey The Lover's Rock (a ballad 1798, taken from Mariana De la Peña de los Enamorados)

Laila, daughter of Okba the sorcerer. It was decreed that either Laila or Thalabi must die. Thalabi refused to redeem his own life by killing Laila, and Okba exultingly cried, "As thou hast disobeyed the voice of Allah, God hath abandoned thee, and this hour is mine." So saying, he rushed on the youth, but Laila, intervening to protect him, received the blow, and was killed. Thalabi lived on, and the spirit of Laila, in the form of a green bird, conducted him to the simorg (q v), which he sought, that he might be directed to Dom-Daniel, the cavern "under the roots of the ocean"—Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer, & (1797)

La'is (2 syl), a generic name for a courtesan. La'is was a Greek hetæra, who sold her favours for £200 English money. When Demosthenes was told the amount of the fee, he said he had "no mind to buy repentance at such a price." One of her great admirers was Diogenes the cynic.

This is the cause
That La'is leads a lady's life aloft
G Gascogne, The Steele Atlas (died 17—)

Lake Poets (The), Wordsworth, Southey, and Coleridge, who lived about the lakes of Cumberland. According to Mr Jeffrey, the conductor of the Lancashire Review, they combined the sentimentality of Rousseau with the simplicity of Kotzebue and the homeliness of Cowper. Of the same school were Lamb, Lloyd, and Wilson. Also called "Lakers" and "Lakists."

Laked'ion (Isaac), the name given in France to the Wandering Jew (q v)

Lalla Rookh, the supposed daughter of Aurungzebe emperor of Delhi. She was betrothed to Aliris sultan of Lesser Bucharra. On her journey from Delhi to Cashmere, she was entertained by Fer'amorz, a young Persian poet, with whom she fell in love, and unbounded was her delight when she discovered that the young poet was the sultan to whom she was betrothed.—T Moore, Lalla Rookh (1817)

Lambert (General), parliamentary leader—Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Lambert (Sir John), the dupe of Dr Cantwell "the hypocrite." He entertains him as his guest, settles on him £400 a year, and tries to make his daughter Charlotte marry him, although he is 59 and she is under 20. His eyes are opened at length by the mercenary and licentious conduct of the doctor. Lady Lambert assists in exposing him, but old lady Lambert remains to the last a believer in the "saint." In Molière's comedy, "Orgon" takes the place of Lambert, "Mlle Parnelle" of the old lady, and "Tartuffe" of Dr Cantwell.

Lady Lambert, the gentle, loving wife of sir John. By a stratagem, she convinces her husband of Dr Cantwell's true character.

Colonel Lambert, son of sir John and lady Lambert. He assists in unmasking "the hypocrite."

Charlotte Lambert, daughter of sir John and lady Lambert. A pretty, bright girl, somewhat giddy and fond of teasing her sweetheart Darnley (see act i 1).—I Bickerstaff, The Hypocrite (1769)

Lambourne (Michael), a retainer of the earl of Leicester—Sir W Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Lambro, a Greek pirate, father of Haidée (q v).—Byron, Don Juan, iii 26, etc (1820)

We confess that our sympathy is most excited by the allent wolf like suffering of Lambro when he experiences the solitude of passing his own door without a welcome and finds the innocence of that sweet child "polluted."—Finden Byron Beauties.

* * The original of this character was major Lambro, who was captain (1791) of a Russian piratical squadron, which plundered the islands of the Greek Archipelago, and did great damage. When his squadron was attacked by seven Algerine corsairs, major Lambro was wounded, but escaped. The incidents referred to in canto vi, etc, are historical.

Lamderg and Gelchossa. Gelchossa was beloved by Lamderg and Ullin son of Cairbar. The rivals fought, and Ullin fell. Lamderg, all bleeding with wounds, just reached Gelchossa to announce the death of his rival, and expired also. "Three days Gelchossa mourned, and then the hunters found her cold," and all three were buried in one grave.—Ossian, Fingal, ii

Lame (The)

Jehan de Meung, called "Clopinel," because he was lame and hobbled.

Tyrtans, the Greek poet, was called the lame or hobbling poet, because he introduced the pentameter verse alternately with the hexameter. Thus his distich consisted of one line with six feet and one line with only five.

The Lame King, Charles II of Naples, Boiteux (1248, 1289-1309)

Lamech's Song. "Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech for I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt. If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold, truly Lamech seventy and sevenfold"—Gen iv 23, 24

As Lamech grew old his eyes became dim and finally all sight was taken from them and Tubal-cain his son led him by the hand when he walked abroad. And it came to pass that he led his father into the fields to hunt and said to his father. "Lo! yonder is a bea.t of prey shoot thine arrow in that direction." Lamech did as his son had spoken and the arrow struck Cain who was walking afar off and killed him. Now when Lamech saw [sic] that he had killed Cain he trembled exceedingly and being blind he saw not his son but struck the bull's head between his hands, and killed him. And he cried to his wives Ada and Zillah. Listen to my voice ye wives of Lamech. I have slain a man to my hurt and a child to my wounding"—The Talmud l.

Lamin'ak, Basque faeries, little folk, who live under ground, and sometimes come into houses down the chimney, in order to change a fairy child for a human one. They bring good luck with them, but insist on great cleanliness, and always give their orders in words the very opposite of their intention. They hate church bells. Every Basque Lamin'ak is named Guillen (William). (See SAR AND MEAN)

Lamington, a follower of sir Geoffroy Peveril—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Lami'ra, wife of Champnerel, and daughter of Vertaigné (2 syl.) a nobleman and a judge.—Berumont and Fletcher, The Little French Lawyer (1647).

Language Characteristics

Charles Quint used to say, "I speak German to my horses, Spanish to my household, French to my friends, and Italian to my mistress"

The Persians say, the serpent in paradise spoke Arabic (the most suasive of all languages), Adam and Eve spoke Persian (the most poetic of all languages), and the angel Gabriel spoke Turkish (the most menacing of all languages) —Chardin, Travels (1686)

Language given to Man to Conceal His Thoughts Said by Montrond, but generally ascribed to Talleyrand (See TALLEYRAND)

Langush (Lydia), a romantic young lady, who is for ever reading sensational novels, and moulding her behaviour on the characters which she reads of in these books of fiction Hence she is a very female Quixote in romantic notions of a sentimental type (see act 1 2) —Sheridan, The Rivals (1775)

Mrs Mellon [1775-1837] called on Sheridan and was requested to read the scenes of Lydia Langush and Mrs. Malaprop from The Rivals. She felt frightened and answered with the naive unaffected manner which she retained through life. I dare not stir I would rather read to all England. But suppose sir you do me the honour of reading them to me? There was something so unassuming and childlike in the request that the manager entered into the oddity of it, and read to her nearly the whole play —Boswell.

Lan'o, a Scandinavian lake, which emitted in autumn noxious vapours

He dwells by the waters of Lano which sends forth the vapour of death —Osian The War of Inis Thona

Lanternize (To) is to spend one's time in literary trifles, to write books, to waste time in "brown studies," etc —Rabelais, Pantagruel, v 33 (1545)

Lantern-Land, the land of authors, whose works are their lanterns. The inhabitants, called "Lanterners" (Lanternois), are bachelors and masters of arts, doctors, and professors, prelates and divines of the council of Trent, and all other wise ones of the earth. Here are the lanterns of Aristotle, Epicurus, and Aristophanes, the dark earthen lantern of Epictetus, the duplex lantern of Martial, and many others. The sovereign was a queen when Pantagruel visited the realm to make inquiry about the "Ordeal of the Holy Bottle" —Rabelais, Pantagruel, v 32, 33 (1545)

Lanternois, pretenders to science, of all sorts, and authors generally

They are the inhabitants of Lantern-land, and their literary productions are "lanterns" —Rabelais, Pantagruel, v 32, 33 (1545)

Laocoon [La ok'oon], a Trojan priest, who, with his two sons, was crushed to death by serpents Thomson, in his Liberty, ii, has described the group, which represents these three in their death agony. It was discovered in 1506, in the baths of Titus, and is now in the Vatican. This exquisite group was sculptured at the command of Titus by Agesander, Polydorus, and Athenodorus, in the fifth century B.C. —Virgil, Aeneid, ii 201-227

Laodamia, wife of Protesilaos who was slain at the siege of Troy. She prayed that she might be allowed to converse with her dead husband for three hours, and her request was granted, but when her husband returned to hades, she accompanied him thither

* * Wordsworth has a poem on this subject, entitled Laodamia

Laodice'a, now Latah'a, noted for its tobacco and sponge —See Rev iii 14-18

Lapet (Mons), a model of politeness, the very "Ereles' Vein" of fanatical cowardice. M. Lapet would fancy the world out of joint if no one gave him a tweak of the nose or lug of the ear. He was the author of a book on the "punctilios of duelling" —Beaumont and Fletcher, Nice Valour or The Passionate Madman (1647)

Lappet, the "glory of all chambermaids" —H. Fielding, The Miser

Lapraick (Laurie), friend of Steeno Steenson, in Wandering Willie's tale —Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Laprel, the rabbit, in the beast-epic entitled Reynard the Fox (1498)

Lapu'ta, the flying island, inhabited by scientific quacks. This is the "Lantern-land" of Rabelais, where wise ones lanternized, and were so absorbed in thought, that certain attendants, called "Flappers," were appointed to flap them on the mouth and ears with blown bladders, when their attention to mundane matters was required —Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Laputa," 1726)

Lara, the name assumed by Conrad the corsair after the death of Medora. On his return to his native country, he was recognized by sir Ezzelin at the table of lord Otho, and charged home by him. Lara arranged a duel for the day following, but sir Ezzelin disappeared mysteriously. Subsequently, Lara headed a rebellion, and was shot by Otho — Byron, Lara (1814)

Lara (The Seven Sons of), sons of Gonzalez Gustios de Lara, a Castilian hero, brother of Ferdinand Gonzalez count of Castile. A quarrel having arisen between Gustios and Rodrigo Velasquez his brother-in-law, Rodrigo caused him to be imprisoned in Cordova, and then allied his seven nephews into a ravine, where they were all slain by an ambuscade, after performing prodigies of valour. While in prison, Zaida, daughter of Almanzor the Moorish prince, fell in love with Gustios, and became the mother of Mudarra, who avenged the death of his seven brothers (A.D. 993)

* * * * * Lope de Vega has made this the subject of a Spanish drama, which has several imitations, one by Mallefille, in 1836 — See Ferd Denis, Chroniques Chatelesques d'Espagne (1839)

Larder (The Douglas), the flour, meal, wheat, and malt of Douglas Castle, emptied on the floor by good lord James Douglas, in 1307, when he took the castle from the English garrison. Having staved in all the barrels of food, he next emptied all the wine and ale, and then, having slain the garrison, threw the dead bodies into this disgusting mess, "to eat, drink, and be merry" — Sir W Scott, Tales of a Grandfather, ix

Wallace's Larder is a similar mess. It consisted of the dead bodies of the garrison of Ardsrossan, in Ayrshire, cast into the dungeon keep. The castle was surprised by him in the reign of Edward I.

Lardoon (Lady Bab), a caricature of fine life, the "princess of dissipation," and the "greatest gamester of the times." She becomes engaged to sir Charles Dupely, and says, "to follow fashion where we feel shame, is the strongest of all hypocrisy, and from this moment I renounce it" — J Burgoyne, The Maid of the Oaks

La Roche, a Swiss pastor, travelling through France with his daughter Margaret, was taken ill, and like to die. There was only a wayside inn in the place, but Hume the philosopher heard of the circumstance, and removed the sick man to his own house. Here, with good nursing, La Roche recovered, and a strong friendship sprang up between the two. Hume even accompanied La Roche to his manse in Berne. After the lapse of three years, Hume was informed that Mademoiselle was about to be married to a young Swiss officer, and hastened to Berne to be present at the wedding. On reaching the neighbourhood, he observed some men filling up a grave, and found on inquiry that Mademoiselle had just died of a broken heart. In fact, her lover had been shot in a duel, and the shock was too much for her. The old pastor bore up heroically, and Hume admired the faith which could sustain a man in such an affliction — H Mackenzie, "Story of La Roche" (in The Mirror)

Lars, the emperor or over-king of the ancient Etruscans. A khedive, satrap, or under-king, was called licimo. Thus the king of Prussia, as emperor of Germany, is lars, but the king of Bavaria is a licimo.

Thou didst not, Cynthia scorn the Latmian swain
Ovid, Art of Love III

Lato'na, mother of Apollo (the sun) and Diana (the moon). Some Latin hinds jeered at her as she knelt by a fountain in Delos to drink, and were changed into frogs

As when those hinds that were transformed to frogs,
Railed at Latona's twin born progeny
Which after held the sun and moon in sea.
Milton Sonnets.

Latorch, duke Rollo's "earwig," in the tragedy called The Bloody Brother, by Beaumont and Fletcher (1639)

Latro (Marcus Porcius), a Roman rhetorician in the reign of Augustus, a Spaniard by birth

I became as mad as the disciples of Porcius Latro who when they had made themselves as pale as their master by drinking decoctions of cuculi imagined themselves as learned.—Lesage Gu Gias vii 9 (1735)

Laud (Archbishop) One day, when the archbishop was about to say grace before dinner, Arelius Armstrong, the royal jester, begged permission of Charles I to perform the office instead. The request being granted, the wise fool said, "All praise to God, and little Laud to the devil!" the point of which is much increased by the fact that the archbishop was a very small man

Laughing Philosopher (The), Democritus of Abdera (B.C. 460–357)

He laughed or jeered at the feeble powers of man so wholly in the hands of fate, that nothing he did or said was uncontrolled. The "Crying Philosopher" was Heraclitus

Dr Jeddler, the philosopher, who looked upon the world as a "great practical joke, something too absurd to be considered seriously by any rational man"—C Dickens, The Battle of Life (1846)

Laughter is situated in the midriff

Here sportful laughter dwells, here ever sitting Defies all lumpish griefs and wrinkled care.

Ph Fletcher The Purple Island (1633)

Laughter (Death from) A fellow in rags told Chalchas the soothsayer that he would never drink the wine of the grapes growing in his vineyard, and added, "If these words do not come true, you may claim me for your slave." When the wine was made, Chalchas made a feast, and sent for the fellow to see how his prediction had failed, and when he appeared, the soothsayer laughed so immoderately at the would-be prophet that he died—Lord Lytton, Tales of Miletus, iv

Somewhat similar is the tale of Anææus. This king of the Lelæges, in Samos, planted a vineyard, but was warned by one of his slaves that he would never live to taste the wine thereof. Wine was made from the grapes, and the king sent for his slave, and said, "What do you think of your prophecy now?" The slave made answer, "There's many a slip 'twixt the eup and the lip," and the words were scarcely uttered, when the king rushed from table to drive out of his vineyard a boar which was laying waste the vines, but was killed in the encounter—Pausanias

Cassus died from laughter on seeing an ass eat thistles. Margutte the giant died of laughter on seeing an ape trying to pull on his boots. Speed is the serving-man of Valentine the other "gentleman"—Shakespeare, The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594)

Launcelot, bard to the countess Brehilda's father—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Launcelot (Sir), originally called Galaad, was the son of Ban king of Benwick (Brittany) and his wife Elaine (pt i 60). He was stolen in infancy by Vivienne the Lady of the Lake, who brought him up till he was presented to King Arthur and knighted. In consequence, he is usually called Sir Launcelot du Lac. He was in "the eighth degree [or generation] of our Saviour" (pt iii 35), was uncle to Sir Bors de Ganis (pt iii 4), his brother was Sir Ector de Maris (pt ii 127), and his son, by Elaine daughter of king Pelles, was sir Galahad, the chastest of the 150 knights of the Round Table, and therefore allotted to the "Siege Perilous" and the quest of the holy grail, which he achieved. Sir Launcelot had from time to time a glimpse of the holy grail, but in consequence of his amours with queen Guenever, was never allowed more than a distant and fleeting glance of it (pt iii 18, 22, 45).

Sir Launcelot was the strongest and bravest of the 150 knights of the Round Table, the two next were sir Tristram and sir Lancelot. His adultery with queen Guenever was directly or indirectly the cause of the death of king Arthur, the breaking up of the Round Table, and the death of most of the knights. The tale runs thus: Mordred and Agravain hated sir Launcelot, told the king he was too familiar with the queen, and, in order to make good their charge, persuaded Arthur to go a-hunting. While absent in the chase, the queen sent for sir Launcelot to her private chamber, when Mordred, Agravain, and twelve other knights beset the door, and commanded him to come forth. In coming forth he slew sir Agravain and the twelve knights, but Mordred escaped, and told the king, who condemned Guenever to be burnt to death. She was brought to the stake, but rescued by sir Launcelot, who carried her off to Joyous Guard, near Carlisle. The king besieged the castle, but received a bull from the pope, commanding him to take back the queen. This he did, but refused to be reconciled to sir Launcelot, who accordingly left the realm and went to Benwick. Arthur crossed over with an army to besiege Benwick, leaving Mordred regent. The traitor Mordred usurped the crown, and tried to make the queen marry him, but she rejected his proposal with contempt. When Arthur heard thereof, he returned, and fought three battles with his nephew, in the last of which Mordred was slain, and the king received from his nephew his death-wound. The queen now retired to the convent of Almesbury, where she was visited by sir Launcelot, but as she refused to leave the convent, sir Launcelot turned monk, died "in the odour of sanctity," and was buried in Joyous Guard (pt iii 143-175).

When sir Launcelot, said sir Ector, thou were [sic] head of all Christian knights. I dare say said sir Bors, sir Launcelot there thou liest thou were never of none earthly knights band and thou were court-oust knight that ever bare shield, and thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode horse, and thou were the truest lover of sinfull man that ever loved woman and thou were the kindest man that ever struck with sword and thou were the goodliest person that ever came among press of knights and thou were the meekest man and the gentlest that ever eat in hall among ladies and thou were the sternest knight to thy mortal foe that ever put spear in rest.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur ill. 176 (1470).

N B.—The Elaine above referred to is not the Elaine of Astolat, the heroine of Tennyson's Idyll. Sir Ector de Maris is not sir Ector the foster-father of king Arthur, and sir Bors de Ganis must be kept distinct from sir Bors of Ganis, and also from sir Borre or sir Bors a natural son of king Arthur by Lynors daughter of the evil Saman (pt i 15).

Sir Launcelot and Elaine. The Elaine of Tennyson's Idyll, called the "fair maid of Astolat," was the daughter of sir Bernard lord of Astolat, and her two brothers were sir Tirre (not sir Torre, as Tennyson writes the word) and Lavaine (pt iii 122). The whole tale, and the beautiful picture of Elaine propelled by the old dumb servitor down the river to the king's palace, is all borrowed from sir T. Malory's compilation. "The fair maid of Astolat" asked sir Launcelot to marry her, but the knight replied, "Fair damsel, I thank you, but certainly cast me never to be married," and when the maid asked if she might be ever with him without being wed, he made answer, "Mersey defend me, no!" "Then," said Elaine, "I needs must die for love of you," and when sir Launcelot quitted Astolat, she drooped and died. Before she died she called her brother, sir Tirre (not sir Lavaine, as Tennyson says, because sir Lavaine went with sir Launcelot as his 'quire), and dictated the letter that her brother was to write, and spake thus:

While my body is whole let this letter be put into my right hand and my hand bound fast with this letter until that I be cold and let me be put in a fair bed with all my richest clothes and be laid in a christ to the next place whereas the Thames is and there let me be put in a barge and but one man with me to steer me thither and that my barge be covered with black samite. So her father granted that all this should be done and she died. And so when she was dead the corpse and the bed were put in a barge and the man steered the barge to Westminster.—Pt. ill. 123.

The narrative then goes on to say that king Arthur had the letter read, and commanded the corpse to be buried right royally, and all the knights then present made offerings over her grave. Not only the tale, but much of the verbiage has been appropriated by the laureate.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Launce'ot and Guinever—Sir Launce'ot was chosen by King Arthur to conduct Guinever (his bride) to court, and then began that arduous journey between them which lasted to the end. Gottfried, the German nunne's tale (twelfth century), who wrote the tale of sir Tristan (four Tristan), makes King Mark send Tristan to Ireland, to conduct Yseult to Cornwall, and then commenced that disloyalty between sir Tristan and his uncle's wife, which also lasted to the end, and was the death of both.

Launce'ot Mad—Sir Launce'ot, having offended the queen, was so vexed, that he went mad for two years, half raving and half melancholy. Being partly cured by a vision of the holy grail, he settled for a time in Jovous Isle, under the assumed name of Le Chevalier Mal-Fet. His deeds of prowess soon got blazed abroad, and brought about him certain knights of the Round Table, who prevailed on him to return to court. Then followed the famous quest of the holy grail. The quest of the grail is the subject of a romance by Wolfram (thirteenth century), entitled Parzival. (In the History of Prince Arthur, compiled by sir T. Malory, it is Golahad son of sir Launce'ot, not Percival, who accomplished the quest.)

* * The madness of Orlando, by Ariosto, resembles that of sir Launce'ot.

Launce'ot a Monk.—When sir Launce'ot discovered that Guinever was resolved to remain a nun, he himself retired to a monastery, and was consecrated a hermit by the bishop of Canterbury. After twelve months, he was miraculously summoned to Almesbury, to remove to Glastonbury the queen, who was at the point of death. Guinever died half an hour before sir Launce'ot arrived, and he himself died soon afterwards (pt iii 173). The bishop in attendance on the dying knight affirmed that "he saw angels heave sir Launce'ot up to heaven, and the gates of paradise open to receive him" (pt iii 173). Sir Bors, his nephew, discovered the dead body in the cell, and had it buried with all honours at Jovous Guard (pt iii 175).—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470), and also Walter Mapes.

When sir Bors and his fellows came to Sir Launce'ot's bed they found him stark dead, and so lay as he lay until the sweetest favour about him that ever they smelt.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, bk. 176 (14 0).

N.B.—Sir Launce'ot intended, when he quitted the court of Arthur and retired to Benwick, to found religious houses every ten miles between Sandwich and Carlisle, and to visit every one of them barefoot, but King Arthur made war upon him, and put an end to this intention.

* * Other particulars of sir Launce'ot.—The tale of sir Launce'ot was first composed in monkish Latin, and was translated by Walter Mapes (about 1180). Robert de Borron wrote a French version, and sir T. Malory took his History of Prince Arthur from the French, the third part being chiefly confined to the adventures and death of this favourite knight. There is a mutual romance called La C'arrille, begun by Chrestien de Troyes (twelfth century), and finished by Geoffrey de Ligny.

Launce'ot, the man of Monks Thomas (See LAUNCE'OT)—Beauport and Icelier, Monks Thomas (1619).

Launfal (Sir), steward of King Arthur. Deceiving queen Guinevere, he retired to Carlowan, and fell in love with a lady named Brianor. She gave him an unfailling purse, and told him if he ever wished to see her, all he had to do was to retire into a private room, and she would be instantly with him. Sir Launfal now returned to court, and excited much attention by his great wealth. Guinevere made advances to him, but he told her she was not worthy to kiss the feet of the lady to whom he was devoted. At this repulse, the angry queen complained to the king, and declared to him that she had been most grossly insulted by his steward. Arthur bade sir Launfal produce this paragon of women. On her arrival, sir Launfal was allowed to accompany her to the tale of Ole'ron, and no one ever saw him afterwards.—Thomas Chestre, Sir Launfal (a mutual romance, time, Henry VI).

* * James Russell Lowell has a poem entitled The Visitation of Sir Launfal.

Laura, niece of duke Gondibert, loved by two brothers, Arnold and Hugo, the latter dwarfed in stature. Laura herself loved Arnold, but both brothers were slain in the faction fight stirred up by prince Oswald against duke Gondibert, his rival in the love of Rhodanthe only child of Albert King of Lombardy. On the death of Arnold and Hugo, Laura became attached to Tybalt. As the tale was never finished, we have no key to the poet's intention respecting Laura and

Tybalt—Sir Wm Davenant, Gondibert (died 1668)

Laura, a Venetian lady, who married Beppo Beppo, being taken captive, turned Turk, joined a band of pirates, and grew rich. He then returned to his wife, made himself known to her, and "had his claim allowed." Laura is represented as a frivolous mixture of millinery and religion. She admires her husband's turban, and dreads his new religion. "Are you really, truly now a Turk?" she says. "Well, that's the prettiest shawl! Will you give it me? They say you eat no pork. Bless me! Did I ever? No, I never saw a man grown so yellow! How's your liver?" and so she rattles on.—Byron, Beppo (1820)

We never read of Laura without being reminded of Addison's Dissection of a Coquette's Heart. In the endless intricacies of which nothing could be distinctly made out but the image of a flame coloured hood.—Finden Byron Beauties

Laura and Petrarch. Somo say La belle Laure was only an hypothetical name used by the poet to hang the incidents of his life and love on. If a real person, it was Laura de Noves, the wife of Hugues de Sade of Avignon, and she died of the plague in 1348.

Think you if Laura had been Petrarch's wife,
He would have written sonnets all his life?

Lauzun (The duke de), a courtier in the court of Louis XIV. Licentious, light-hearted, unprincipled, and extravagant. In order to make a market, he supplanted La Vallière by Mde de Montespan in the king's favour. Montespan thought he loved her, but when he proposed to La Vallière the discarded favourite, Montespan kicked him over

The duke, in revenge, persuaded the king to banish the lady, and when La Vallière took the veil, the king sent Mde de Montespan this cutting epistle

We do not blame you blame belongs to love
And love had nought with you.

Lavalette (3 syl), condemned to death for sending to Napoleon secret intelligence of Government despatches. He was set at liberty by his wife, who took his place in prison, but became a confirmed lunatic.

Lord Nithsdale escaped in a similar manner from the Tower of London. His wife disguised him as her maid, and he passed the sentries without being detected.

La Vallière (Louise duchess de), betrothed to the marquis de Bragelonné (4 syl), but in love with Louis XIV, whose mistress she became. Conscience accused her, and she fled to a convent, but the king took her out, and brought her to Versailles. He soon forsook her for Mde de Montespan, and advised her to marry. This message almost broke her heart, and she said, "I will choose a bridegroom without delay." Accordingly she took the veil of a Carmelite nun, and discovered that Bragelonné was a monk. Mde de Montespan was banished from the court by the capricious monarch.—Lord E. L. B. Lytton, The Duchess de la Valliere (1836)

Lavinia, daughter of Latinus, betrothed to Turnusking of the Rutuli. When Aeneas landed in Italy, Latinus made an alliance with him, and promised to give him Lavinia to wife. This brought on a war between Turnus and Aeneas, that was decided by single combat, in which Aeneas was the victor.—Virgil, Aeneid

Lavinia, daughter of Titus Andronicus a Roman general employed against the Goths. She was betrothed to Bassianus, brother of Sittulus emperor of Rome. Being defiled by the sons of Tamora queen of the Goths, her hands were cut off and her tongue plucked out. At length her father Titus killed her, saying, "I am as woeful as Virginus was, and have a thousand times more cause than he to do this outrage"—(?) Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus (1593).

In the play, Andronicus is always called Andronicus, but in classic authors it is Andronikos.

Lavinia, sister of lord Al'tamont, and wife of Horatio—N. Rowe, The Fair Penitent (1703).

Lavinia and Palemon Lavinia was the daughter of Acosto patron of Palemon, from whom his "liberal fortune took its rise." Acosto lost his property, and dying, left a widow and daughter in very indigent circumstances. Palemon often sought them out, but could never find them. One day, a lovely modest maiden came to glean in Palemon's fields. The young squire was greatly struck with her exceeding beauty and modesty, but did not dare ally himself with a pauper. Upon inquiry, he found that the beautiful gleaner was the daughter of Acosto, he proposed marriage, and Lavinia "blushed assent"—Thomson, Seasons ("Autumn," 1730).

* * * The resemblance between this tale and the Bible story of Ruth and Boaz must be obvious to every one.

Lavinian Shore (The), Italy Lavinium was a town of Latium, founded by Aeneas in honour of his wife Lavinia.

Law of Athens (The) By Athenian law, a father could dispose of his daughter in marriage as he liked. Egus pleaded this law, and demanded that his daughter Hermia should marry Demetrius or suffer the penalty of the law, if she will not.

Consent to marry with Demetrius
I beg the ancient privilege of Athens
As she is mine I may dispose of her
Which shall be either to this gentleman
Or to her death; according to our law
Shakespeare A Midsummer Night's Dream act I. sc. 1 (1592)

Law of Flanders (The) Charles "the Good," earl of Flanders made a law that a serf, unless legally emancipated, was always a serf, and that whoever married a serf became a serf. S. Knowles has founded his tragedy called The Provost of Bruges on this law (1836).

Law of Lombardy (The)

We have a law peculiar to this realm,
That subjects to a mortal penalty
All women nobly born who to the shame
Of chastity o'erstep its thorny bounds
To wand'ron in the flowery path of pleasure
Act II. —

On this law Robert Jephson has founded the following tragedy. The duke Bireno, heir to the crown, falsely charges the princess Sophia of incontinence. The villainy of the duke being discovered, he is slain in combat by a Briton named Paladore, and the victor marries the princess (1779).

Law's Bubble, the famous Mississippi scheme, devised by John Law (1716-1720).

Law's Tale (The Man of), the tale about Custance, daughter of the emperor of Rome, affianced to the sultan of Syria. On the wedding night the sultan's mother murdered all the bridal party for apostasy, except Custance, whom she turned adrift in a ship. The ship stranded on the shores of Britain, where Custance was rescued by the lord-constable of Northumberland, whose wife, Hermegild, became much attached to her. A young knight wished to marry Custance, but she declined his suit, whereupon he murdered Hermegild, and then laid the knife beside Custance, to make it appear that she had committed the deed. King Alla, who tried the case, soon discovered the truth, executed the knight, and married Custance. Now was repeated the same infamy as occurred to her in Syria: the queen-mother Donegild disapproved of the match, and, during the absence of her son in Scotland, embarked Custance and her infant son in the same ship, which she turned adrift. After floating about for five years, it was taken in tow by the Roman fleet on its return from Syria, and Custance was put under the charge of a Roman senator. It so happened that Alla was at Rome at the very time on a pilgrimage, met his wife, and they returned to Northumberland together.

This story is found in Gower, who probably took it from the French chronicle of Nicholas Trivet.

A similar story forms the outline of Emäré (3 syl), a romance in Ritson's collection.

The knight murdering Hermegild, etc., resembles an incident in the French Roman de la Violette, the English metrical romance of Le Bone Florence of Rome (in Ritson), and also a tale in the Gesta Romanorum, 69

Lea, one of the "daughters of men," beloved by one of the "sons of God" The angel who loved her ranked with the least of the spirits of light, whose post around the throne was in the outermost circle Sent to earth on a message, he saw Lea bathing, and fell in love with her, but Lea was so heavenly minded that her only wish was to "dwell in purity and serve God in singleness of heart." Her angel lover, in the madness of his passion, told Lea the spell-word that gave him admittance into heaven. The moment Lea uttered it, her body became spiritual, rose through the air, and vanished from sight. On the other hand, the angel lost his ethereal nature, and became altogether earthly, like a child of clay.—T. Moore, Loves of the Angels, 1 (1822)

League (The), a league formed at Peronne in 1576, to prevent the accession of Henri IV. to the throne of France, because he was of the reformed religion. This league was mainly due to the Guises. It is occasionally called "The Holy League," but the "Holy League" strictly so called is quite another thing, and it is better not to confound different events by giving them the same name (See LEAGUE, HOLY)

League (The Achaean), B.C. 281-146. The old league consisted of the twelve Achaean cities confederated for self-defence from the remotest times. The league properly so called was formed against the Macedonians.

League (The Aetolian), formed some three centuries B.C., when it became a formidable rival to the Macedonian monarchs and the Achaean League.

League (The Grey), 1424, called Lia Grischa or Graubünd, from the grey homespun dress of the confederate peasants, the Grisons, in Switzerland. This league combined with the League Caddee (1401) and the League of the Ten Jurisdictions (1436), in a perpetual alliance in 1471. The object of these leagues was to resist domestic tyranny.

League (The Hanse or Hansatic), 1241-1630, a great commercial confederation of German towns, to protect their merchandise against the Baltic pirates, and defend their rights against the German barons and princes. It began with Hamburg and Lübeck, and was joined by Bremen, Bruges, Bergen, Novogorod, London, Cologne, Brunswick, Danzig, and, afterwards by Dunkerque, Amvers, Ostend, Dordrecht, Rotterdam, Amsterdam, etc.; still later by Calais, Rouen, St. Malo, Bordeaux, Bayonne, Marseilles, Barcelona, Seville, Cadiz, and Lisbon, and lastly by Messina, Naples, etc., in all eighty cities.

League (The Holy). Several leagues are so denominated, but that emphatically so called is the league of 1511 against Louis XII., formed by pope Julius II., Ferdinand "the Catholic," Henry VIII., the Venetians, and the Swiss. Gaston de Foix obtained a victory over the league at Ravenna in 1512, but died in the midst of his triumph.

League (The Solemn), 1638, formed in Scotland against the episcopal government of the Church.

League Caddee (The) or Ligue de la Maison de Dieu (1401), a confederation of the Grisons for the purpose of resisting domestic tyranny (See LEAGUE, GREY)

League of Augsburg (1686), a confederation of the house of Austria with Sweden, Saxony, Bavaria, the circles of Swabia and Franconia, etc., against Louis XIV. This league was the beginning of that war which terminated in the peace of Ryswick (1698).

League of Cambray (1508), formed by the emperor Maximilian I., Louis XII. of France, Ferdinand "the Catholic" and pope Julius II., against the republic of Venice.

League of Ratisbonne (1524), by the catholic powers of Germany against the progress of the Reformation.

League of Smalkalde (December 31, 1530), the protestant states of Germany leagued against Charles Quint. It was almost broken up by the victory obtained over it at Mühlberg in 1547.

League of Wurtzburg (1610), formed by the catholic states of Germany against the "Protestant Union" of Hail Maximilian I. of Bavaria was at its head.

League of the Beggars (1560), a combination formed against the Inquisition in Flanders.

League of the Cities of Lombardy (1167), under the patronage of pope Alexander III., against Frederick Barbarossa emperor of Germany. In 1225, the cities combined against Frederick II. of Germany.

League of the Public Weal

(Ligue du Bun Public), 1464, a league between the dukes of Burgundy, Brittany, Bourbon, and other princes, against Louis XI of France

Lean'der (3 syl), a young man of Abydos, who swam nightly across the Hellespont to visit his lady-love, Hero a priestess of Sestos. One night he was drowned in his attempt, and Hero leaped into the Hellespont and died also

The story is told by Musæus in his poem called Hero and Leander. Schiller has made it the subject of a ballad

Lean'der, a young Spanish scholar, smitten with Leonora, a maiden under the charge of don Diego, and whom the don wished to make his wife. The young scholar disguised himself as a minstrel to amuse Mungo the slave, and with a little flattery and a few gold pieces lulled the vigilance of Ursula the duenna, and gained admittance to the lady. As the lovers were about to elope, don Diego unexpectedly returned, but being a man of 60, and, what is more, a man of sense, he at once perceived that Leander was a more suitable husband for Leonora than himself, and accordingly sanctioned their union and gave the bride a handsome dowry.—I Bickerstaff, The Padlock

Leandra, daughter of an opulent Spanish farmer, who eloped with Vincent de la Rosa, a heartless adventurer, who robbed her of all her money, jewels, and other valuables, and then left her to make her way home as best she could. Leandra was placed in a convent till the scandal had blown over.—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I iv 20 ("The Goat-herd's Story," 1605)

Leandre (2 syl), son of Geronte (2 syl). During the absence of his father, he fell in love with Zerbinette, whom he supposed to be a young gipsy, but who was in reality the daughter of Argante (2 syl) his father's friend. Some gipsies had stolen the child when only four years old, and required £30 for her ransom—a sum of money which Scapin contrived to obtain from Léandre's father under false pretences. When Geronte discovered that his son's bride was the daughter of his friend Argante, he was quite willing to excuse Scapin for the deceit practised on him.—Molière, Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671)

(In Otway's version of this comedy, called The Cheats of Scapin, Léandre is Anglified into "Leander," Geronte is called "Gripe," Zerbinette is "Lucia," Argante is "Thrifty," and the sum of money is £200)

Léandre, the lover of Lucinde daughter of Geronte (2 syl). Being forbidden the house, Lucinde pretended to be dumb, and Léandre, being introduced in the guise of an apothecary, effects a cure by "pills matrimoniales"—Molière, Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666)

Lear, mythical king of Britain, son of Bladud. He had three daughters, and when four score years old, wishing to retire from the active duties of sovereignty, resolved to divide his kingdom between them in proportion to their love. The two older said they loved him more than their tongue could express, but Cordelia the youngest said she loved him as it became a daughter to love her father. The old king, displeased with her answer, disinherited Cordelia, and divided his kingdom between the other two, with the condition that each alternately, month by month, should give him a home, with a suite of a hundred knights. He spent the first month with his eldest daughter, who showed him scant hospitality. Then going to the second, she refused to entertain so large a suite, whereupon the old man would not enter her house but spent the night abroad in a storm. When Cordelia, who had married the king of France, heard of this, she brought an army over to dethrone her sisters, but was taken prisoner and died in jail. In the mean time, the elder sister (Goneril) first poisoned her younger sister from jealousy, and afterwards put an end to her own life Lear also died — Shakespeare, King Lear (1605)

(The best performers of "King Lear" were David Garrick (1716-1779) and W C Macready (1793-1873) The stage Lear is a corrupt version by Nahum Tate (Tate and Brady), as the stage Richard III is Colley Cibber's travesty.)

Lemnian Deed (A), one of unparalleled cruelty and barbarity. This Greek phrase owes its origin to the legend that the Lemnian women rose one night, and put to death every man and male child in the island.

On another occasion they slew all the men and all the children born of Athenian parents.

Lenore, a name which Edgar Poe has introduced in two of his poems, one called The Raven, and the other called Lenore (1811-1849).

Lenore, the heroine of Bürger's ballad of that name, in which a spectral lover appears after death to his mistress, and carries her on horseback behind him to the graveyard, where their marriage is celebrated amid a crew of howling goblins. Based on a Dutch ballad.

* * The Suffolk Miracle is an old English ballad of like character.

Lenormand (Mdlle), a famous trousse de cartes. She was a squat, fussy, little old woman, with a gnarled and knotted visage, and an imperturbable eye. She wore her hair cut short and parted on one side, like that of a man, dressed in an odd-looking casagun, embroidered and frogged like the jacket of an hussar, and snuffed continually. This was the little old woman whom Napoleon I regularly consulted before setting out on a campaign. Mdlle Lenormand foretold to Josephine her divorce, and when Murat king of Naples visited her in disguise, she gave him the cards to cut, and he cut four times in succession le grand pendu (king of diamonds), whereupon Mdlle rose and said, "Là s'enace est terminée, c'est dix louis pour les rois," pocketed the fee, and left the room taking snuff.

(In cartomancy, le grand pendu signifies that the person to which it is dealt, or who cuts it, will die by the hands of the executioner. See GRAND PENDU.)

Leodegaurance or LEODOGRAN, king of Camelyard, father of Guenever (King Arthur's wife). Uther the pendragon gave him the famous Round Table, which would seat 150 knights (pt 1 45), and when Arthur married Guenever, Leodegaurance gave him the table and 100 knights as a wedding gift (pt 1 46). The table was made by Merlin, and each seat had on it the name of the knight to whom it belonged. One of the seats was called the "Siege Perilous," because no one could sit on it without "peril of his life" except Sir Galahad the virtuous and chaste, who accomplished the quest of the holy grail — Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Leodogran the king of Camelard [sic]
Had one fair daughter and none other child,
And she was fairest of all flesh on earth
Guinevere and in her his one delight.

Tennyson Coming of Arthur

Le'olne (3 syl), one of the male attendants of Dionysus's wife of Cleon, governor of Tarsus, and employed by his mistress to murder Marina the orphan daughter of prince Pericles, who had been committed to her charge to bring up. Leoline took Marina to the shore with this view, when some pirates seized her, and sold her at Matal'ne for a slave. Leoline told his mistress that the orphan was dead, and Dionysus roused a splendid sepulchre to her memory — Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

Leonardo [GONZAGA], duke of Mantua. Travelling in Switzerland, an avalanche fell on him, and he was nursed through a severe illness by Mariana the daughter of a Swiss burgher, and they fell in love with each other. On his return home, he was entrapped by brigands, and kept prisoner for two years. Mariana, seeking him, went to Mantua, where count Florio fell in love with her, and obtained her guardian's consent to their union, but Mariana refused to comply. The case was referred to the duke (Ferrardo), who gave judgment in favour of the count. Leonardo happened to be present, and, throwing off his disguise, assumed his rank as duke, and married Mariana, but, being called away to the camp, left Ferrardo regent. Ferrardo laid a most villainous scheme to prove Mariana guilty of adultery with Julian St Pierre, but Leonardo refused to credit her guilt. Julian turned out to be her brother, exposed the whole plot, and amply vindicated Mariana of the slightest indiscretion—S Knowles, The Wife (1833)

Leonora (Fidelio) was allowed to unlock her husband's chains, and Pizarro's revenge came to naught—Beethoven, Fidelio (an opera, 1791)

Leonora, a princess, who falls in love with Manrico, the supposed son of Azucena a gipsy, but in reality the son of Garzia (brother of the conte di Luna) The conte di Luna entertains a base passion for the princess, and, getting Manrico into his power, is about to kill him, when Leonora intercedes, and promises to give herself to the count if he will spare his nephew's life The count consents, but while he goes to release Manrico, Leonora kills herself by sucking poison from a ring, and Manrico dies also—Verdi, Il Trovatore (an opera, 1853)

Leonora (The History of), an episode in the novel of Joseph Andrews, by Fielding (1742)

Leonora [d'ESTRE] (2 syl), sister of Alfonso II reigning duke of Ferrara The poet Tasso conceived a violent passion for this princess, but "she knew it not or viewed it with disdain" Leonora never married, but lived with her eldest sister, Lauretta duchess of Urbino, who was separated from her husband The episode of Sophronia and Olindo (Jerusalem Delivered, ii) is based on this love incident The description of Sophronia is that of Leonora, and her ignorance of Olindo's love points to the poet's unregarded devotion

But thou shalt have
One half the laurel which overshades my grave
Yes Leonora, it shall be our fate
To be entwined for ever—but too late

Byron The Lament of Tasso (1817)

Leonora de Guzman, the "favourite" of Alfonso XI of Castile Ferdinand, not knowing that she was the king's mistress, fell in love with her, and Alfonso, to reward Ferdinand's services, gave her to him in marriage No sooner was this done, than the bridegroom learned the character of his bride, rejected her with scorn, and became a monk Leonora became a novice in the same convent, obtained her husband's forgiveness, and died—Donizetti, La Favorita (an opera, 1842)

Leontes (3 syl), king of Sicily He invited his old friend Polixenes king of Bohemia to come and stay with him, but became so jealous of him that he commanded Camillo to poison him Instead of doing so, Camillo warned

Polixen^{us} of his danger, and fled with him to Bohemia. The rage of Leont^{us} was now unbounded, and he cast his wife Hermion^e into prison, where she gave birth to a daughter. The king ordered the infant to be cast out on a desert shore, and then brought his wife to a public trial. Hermion^e fainted in court, the king had her removed, and Paulina soon came to announce that the queen was dead. Ultimately, the infant daughter was discovered under the name of Perdita, and was married to Florizel the son of Polixen^{us}. Hermion^e was also discovered to the king in a tableau vivant, and the joy of Leont^{us} was complete — Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale (1604)

Leyceppes and Clitophonta, a romance in Greek, by Achilles Tatius, in the fifth century, borrowed largely from the Theag'enes and Chariclea of Heliodorus bishop of Trikka

Liar (The), a farce by Samuel Foote (1761). John Wilding, a young gentleman fresh from Oxford, has an extraordinary propensity for romancing. He invents the most marvellous tales, utterly regardless of truth, and thereby involves both himself and others in endless perplexities. He pretends to fall in love with a Miss Grantam, whom he accidentally meets, and, wishing to know her name, is told it is Godfrey, and that she is an heiress. Now it so happens that his father wants him to marry the real Miss Grantam, and, in order to avoid so doing, he says he is already married to a Miss Sibthorpe. He afterwards tells his father he invented this tale because he really wished to marry Miss Godfrey. When Miss Godfrey is introduced, he does not know her, and while in this perplexity a woman enters, who declares she is his wife, and that her maiden name was Sibthorpe. Again he is dumfounded, declares he never saw her in his life, and rushes out, exclaiming, "All the world is gone mad, and is in league against me!"

* * The plot of this farce is from the Spanish. It had been already taken by Corneille in Le Menteur (1642), and by Steele in his Lying Lover (1701)

Liar (The), Al Aswad, also called "The Impostor," and "The Weathercock." He set himself up as a prophet against Mahomet, but frequently changed his creed.

Mosëlma was also called "The Liar." He wrote a letter to Mahomet, which began thus "From Mosëlma prophet of Allah, to Mahomet prophet of Allah," and received an answer beginning thus "From Mahomet the prophet of Allah, to Mosëlma the Liar."

Liars (The Prince of), Ferdinand Mendez Pinto, a Portuguese traveller, whose narratives deal so much in the marvellous that Cervantes dubbed him "The Prince of Liars." He is alluded to in the Tatler as a man "of infinite adventure and unbounded imagination."

Sir John Mandeville is called "The Lying Traveller" (1800-1872)

Liban'iel (4 syl), the guardian angel of Philip the apostle—Klopstock, The Messiah, III (1748)

Liberator (The) Daniel O'Connell was so called because he was the leader of the Irish party, which sought to sever Ireland from England. Also called "The Irish Agitator" (1776-1847)

Simon Bolivar, who established the independence of Peru, is so called by the Peruvians (1785-1831)

Liberator of the New World (The), Dr Franklin (1706-1790)

Liberty (Goddess of) On December 20, 1793, the French installed the worship of reason for the worship of God, and M Chaumette induced Mlle Mallard, an actress, to personify the "goddess of Liberty." She was borne in a palanquin, dressed with buskins, a Phrygian cap, and a blue chlamys over a white tunic. Being brought to Notre Dame, she was placed on the high altar, and a huge candle was placed behind her. Mlle Mallard lighted the candle, to signify that liberty frees the mind from darkness, and is the "light of the world," then M Chaumette fell on his knees to her and offered incense as to a god.

Liberty (The goddess of) The statue so called, placed over the entrance of the Palais Royal, represented Mde Talien.

Lichas, servant of Herenlès, who brought to him from Dejanira the poisoned shirt of Nessus. He was thrown by Herenlès from the top of mount Etna into the sea. Seneca says (Hercules) that Lichas was tossed aloft into the air, and sprinkled the clouds with his blood. Ovid says "He congealed, like hail, in mid-air, and turned to stone, then, falling into the Lucrine Sea, became a rock, which still bears his name and retains the human form" (Mt, ix)

Let me lodge Lichas on the horns of the moon.

Lickitup (The laird of), friend of Neil Blane the town piper—Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Lie The four P's disputed as to which could tell the greatest lie. The Palmer asserted that he had never seen a woman out of patience, the other three P's (a Pardoner, a Potheary, and a Pedlar) were so taken aback by this assertion that they instantly gave up the contest, saying that it was certainly the greatest falsehood they had ever heard—John Heywood, The Four P's (1520).

Lie Tennyson says

A lie which is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies.

A lie which is all a lie may be met and fought with out-right

But a lie which is part a truth is a harder matter to fight.
The Grandmother

Liebenstein and Sternfels, two ruined castles on the Rhine. Leoline the orphan was the sole surviving child of the lord of Liebenstein, and two brothers (Warbeck and Otto) were the only surviving children of the lord of Sternfels. Both these brothers fell in love with Leoline, but as the lady gave Otto the preference, Warbeck joined the crusades. Otto followed his brother to Palestine, but the war was over, and Otto brought back with him a Greek girl, whom he had made his bride. Warbeck now sent a challenge to his brother for this insult to Leoline, but Leoline interposed to stop the fight. Soon after this the Greek wife eloped, and Otto died childless. Leoline retired to the adjacent convent of Bornhofen, which was attacked by robbers, and Warbeck, in repelling them, received his death-wound, and died in the lap of Leoline—Traditions of the Rhine

Life (The Battle of), a Christmas story, by C Dickens (1846). It is the story of Grace and Marion, the two daughters of Dr Jeddler, both of whom loved Alfred Herthfield, their father's ward. Alfred loved the younger daughter, but Marion, knowing of her sister's love, left her home clandestinely, and all thought she had eloped with Michael Warden. Alfred then married Grace, and in due time Marion made it known to her sister that she had given up Alfred to her, and had gone to live with her aunt Martha till they were married. It is said that Marion subsequently married Michael Warden, and found with him a happy home.

Is John departed and is Lilburn gone?
Farewell to both to Lilburn and to John!
Yet being gone take this advice from me
Let them not both in one grave buried be Here lay ye John lay Lilburn thereabout
For if they both should meet, they would fall out

Limbo (Latin, limbus, "an edge"), a sort of neutral land on the confines of paradise, for those who are not good enough for heaven and not bad enough for hell, or rather for those who cannot (according to the Church "system") be admitted into paradise, either because they have never heard the gospel or else have never been baptized.

There's a sign
Wee blame him and if aught they merited
It profits not since baptism was not the rite
If they before
The gospel lived they merited not God aught
For these delinquents
And for no other evil we are lost—
Dante, Inferno IV. (1304)

Limbo of the Moon Ariosto, in his Orlando Furioso, CANTO 70, says, in the moon are treasured up the precious time misspent in play, all vain efforts, all vows never paid, all counsel thrown away, all desires that lead to nothing, the vanity of titles, flattery, great men's promises, court services, and death-bed alms Pope says

There heroes' wills are kept in ponderous vaults,
And beats in swift boxes and sweetenered cells
There broken vows and death-bed alms are found
And lovers' hearts with ends of ribbon bound
The courtiers' promises and sick men's prayers
The riddles of harlots and the tears of heirs
Curses for cursers and chains to yoke a flea Dried butterflies and torres of casuality
Pope of the Lock v. (1714)

Limbus Patuorian or the "Fools Paradise," for idiots, madmen, and others who are not responsible for their sins, but yet have done nothing worthy of salvation Milton says, from the earth fly to the Paradise of Fools

All things transitory and vain the fruits
Of painful superstition and blind zeal
All the unaccomplished works of Nature's hand,
Abortive monstrous or unkindly mixed
The builders here of Babel

Paradise Lost III. 4-8 (1633)

Limbus Patrum, that half-way house between purgatory and paradise, where patriarchs and prophets, saints, martyrs, and confessors, await the "second coming" This, according to some, is the hadēs or "hell" into which Christ descended when "Ho preached to the spirits in prison" Dantē places Limbo on the confines of hell, but tells us those doomed to dwell there are "only so far afflicted as that they live without hope" (Inferno, 11)

I have some of them in Limbo Patrum and there they are like to dance these three days.—Shakespeare Henry VIII act v sc. 3 (1601)

Limbo Puerōrum or "Child's Paradise," for unbaptized infants too young to commit actual sin but not eligible for heaven because they have not been baptized

Lincolnshire Grazier (A) The Rev Thomas Hartwell Horne published The Complete Grazier under this pseudonym (1805)

Linco'ya (3 syl), husband of Co'atel, and a captive of the Aztecas "Once, when a chief was feasting Madoc, a captive served the food" Madoc says, "I marked the youth, for he had features of a gentler race, and oftentimes his eye was fixed on me with looks of more than wonder" This young man, "the flower of all his nation," was to be immolated to the god Tezcalipōca, but on the eve of sacrifice he made his escape, and flew to Madoc for protection The fugitive proved both useful and faithful, but when he heard of the death of Coatel, he was quite heart-broken Azyāca, to divert him, told him about the spirit-land, and Lincoya asked, "Is the way thither long?"

The old man replied "A way of many moons."
I know a shorter path," exclaimed the youth -
And up he sprang and from the precipice
Darted. A moment and Azyca heard
His body fall upon the rocks below

Lindsay (Margaret), the heroine of a novel by professor John Wilson, entitled Trials of Margaret Lindsay, a very pathetic story (1785-1854)

Linnet, daughter of Sir Persaunt, and sister of Lions of Castle Perilous (ch 131) Her sister was held captive by Sir Ironside, the Red Knight of the Red Lands Linnet went to King Arthur to entreat that one of his knights might be sent to liberate her, but as she refused to give up the name of her sister, the king said no knight of the Round Table could undertake the adventure At this, a young man nicknamed "Beaumains" (Gareth), who had been serving in the kitchen for twelve months, entreated that he might be allowed the quest, which the king granted Linnet, however, treated him with the utmost contumely, calling him dish-washer, kitchen knave, and lout, but he overthrew all the knights opposed to him, delivered the lady Lions, and married her (See LINETTE)—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 120-153 (1470)

 Some men nicknamed her "The Savage" (ch 151) Tennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, makes Gareth marry Lynette, which spoils the allegory (See p. 365.)

Lingo, in O'Keefe's comedy Agreeable Surprise (1798)

Linkinwater (Tim), confidential clerk to the brothers Cheeverble. A kind-hearted old bachelor, fossilized in ideas, but most kind-hearted, and devoted to his masters almost to idolatry. He is much attached to a blind blackbird called "Dick," which he keeps in a large cage. The bird has lost its voice from old age, but, in Tim's opinion, there is no equal to it in the whole world. The old clerk marries Miss La Creevy, a miniature-painter.

Punctual as the counting house dial, he performed the minutest actions, and arranged the minutest articles of his little room in a precise and regular order. Paper pens, ink, ruler, sealing wax, wafers, Tim's hat, Tim's scrupulously folded gloves, Tim's other coat, all had their accurate niches of space. There was not a more accurate instrument in existence than Tim Linkinwater.—C. Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, xxviii (1855)

Linklater (Laurie), yeoman of the king's kitchen. A friend to Ritchie Moniphies—Sir W. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.)

Linne (The Heir of), a great spendthrift, who sold his estates to John-o'-the-Scales, his steward, reserving for himself only a "poor and lonesome lodge in a lonely glen." Here he found a rope, with a running noose, and put it round his neck, with the intention of hanging himself. The weight of his body broke the rope, and he fell to the ground. He now found two chests of gold and one of silver, with this inscription: "Once more, my son, I set thee clear. Amend thy life, or a rope must end it." The heir of Linne now went to the steward for the loan of forty pence, which was denied him. One of the guests said, "Whiv, John, you ought to lend it, for you had the estates cheap enough." "Cheap," said John, "Whiv, he shall have them back for a hundred marks less than the money I gave for them." "Done!" said the heir of Linne, and counted out the money. Thus he recovered his estates, and made the kind guest his forester—Perey, Reliques, II. ii 5.

Lion (A), emblem of the tribe of Judah. In the old church at Totnes is a stone pulpit divided into compartments containing shields, decorated with the several emblems of the Jewish tribes, of which this is one.

Judah is a lion's whelp, he couched as a lion and as an old lion, who shall rouse him up!—Gen. xlix. 9.

Lion (The), symbol of ambition. When Dante began the ascent of fame, he was met first by a panther (pleasure), and then by a lion (ambition), which tried to stop his further progress.

A lion came
With head erect and hunger mad.
Dante, Hell, l. (130.)

Lion (The), Henry, duke of Bavaria and Saxony, son of Henry "the Proud" (1120-1195).

Louis VIII of France, born under the sign Leo (1187, 1223-1226).

William of Scotland, who chose a red lion rampant for his cognizance (*), 1165-1214).

Lion (The Golden), emblem of ancient Assyria. The bear was that of ancient Persia.

Where is the Assyrian lion's golden hide
That all the beasts once graced in lordly pride?
Where that great Persian bear, whose sweating pride
The lion's self tore out with raw paw's jaw?
Fletcher, The Purple Island, vii (1635).

Lion (The Valiant), Alep Arslan, son of Togrul Beg the Perso-Turkish monarch (*), 1063-1072).

Lion Attending on Man

Una was attended by a lion. Spenser says that Una was seeking St. George, and as she sat to rest herself, a lion rushed suddenly out of a thicket, with gaping mouth and lashing tail, but as it drew near, it was awe-struck, licked her feet and hands, and followed her like a dog. Sansloy slew the faithful beast—Fairy Queen, I. iii 12 (1590).

* * * This is an allegory of the Reformation. The "lion" means England, and "Una" means truth or the reformed religion. England (the lion) waited on truth or the Reformation. "Sansloy" means queen Mary or false faith, which killed the lion, or separated England from truth (or the true faith). It might seem to some that Sansloy should have been substituted for Sansloy, but this could not be, because Sansloy had been slain already.

Sir Livan de Gallis or Iwan de Gallis was attended by a lion, which, in gratitude to the knight, who had delivered it from a serpent, ever after became his faithful servant, approaching the knight with tears, and rising on its hind feet.

Sir Geoffrey de Latour was aided by a lion against the Saracens, but the faithful brute was drowned in attempting to follow the vessel in which the knight had embarked on his departure from the Holy Land.

St. Jerome is represented as attended by a lion. (See ANDROCCLUS, p. 37.)

Lion of God (The), Ali, son-in-law of Mahomet. He was called at birth "The Rugged Lion" (al Haidara) (607-655-661)

Hamza, called "The Lion of God and of His Prophet." So Gabriel told Mahomet his uncle was registered in heaven.

Lion of Janina, Ali Pasha, overthrown in 1822 by Ibrahim Pasha (1741, 1788-1822)

Lion of the North (The), Gustavus Adolphus (1594, 1611-1632)

Lion-Heart Richard I was called Cœur de Lion because he plucked out a lion's heart, to which beast he had been exposed by the duke of Austria, for having slain his son.

It is said that a lion was put to Lynce Pluchard bying in prison to devour him, and when the lion was gayning he put his arms in his mouth and pulled the lion by the harts so hard that he slew the lion, and therefore he is called Richard Cœur de Lion.—Rail Chronicle (163.)

Lion King of Assyria, Arioch al Asser (B.C. 1927-1897)

Lion Rouge (Le), marshal Ney, who had red hair and red whiskers (1769-1815)

Lion-Tamer One of the most remarkable was Ellen Bright, who exhibited in Wombwell's menagerie. She was killed by a tiger in 1850, aged 17 years.

Lions (White and Red) Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnenus emperor of Constantinople, says his land is the "home of white and red lions" (1160)

Lion's Provider (The), the jackal, which often starts prey that the lion appropriates.

the poor jackals are less foul
(As being the brave lion's keen providers)
Than human insects catering for spiders
Byron Don Juan ix. 27 (1804)

Lionel and Clarissa, an opera by Bickerstaff. Sir John Flowerdale has a daughter named Clarissa, whose tutor is Lionel, an Oxford graduate. Colonel Oldboy, his neighbour, has a son named Jessamy, a noodle and a fop, and a daughter, Diana. A proposal is made for Clarissa Flowerdale to marry Jessamy, but she despises the prig, and loves Lionel. After a little embroglio, Sir John gives his consent to this match. Now for Diana Harman, a guest of Oldboy's, tells him he is in love, but that the father of the lady will not consent to his marriage. Oldboy advises him to clope, lends his carriage and horses, and writes a letter for Harman, which he is to send to the girl's father. Harman follows this advice, and elopes with Diana, but Diana repents, returns home unmarried, and craves her father's forgiveness. The old colonel yields, the lovers are united, and Oldboy says he likes Harman the better for his pluck and manliness.

Lionell (Sir), brother of sir Launcelet, son of Ban King of Benwick (Brittany)

Liones (3 syl), daughter of sir Perisant of Castle Perilous, where she was held captive by sir Ironside, the Red Knight of the Red Lands. Her sister Linct went to the court of king Arthur to request that some knight would undertake to deliver her from her oppressor, but as she refused to give up the name of the lady, the king said no knight of the Round Table could undertake the quest. On this, a stranger, nicknamed "Bernmain" from the unusual size of his hands, and who had served in the kitchen for twelve months, begged to be sent, and his request was granted. He was very scornfully treated by Linct, but succeeded in overthrowing every knight who opposed him, and, after combating from dawn to sunset with sir Ironside, made him also do homage. The lady, being now free, married the "kitchen knight," who was, in fact, sir Gareth, son of Lot king of Orkney, and Linct married his brother Gareth. (See LIONS of Castle Perilous).—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i. 120-153 (1470)

Lionesse (3 syl), Lyonesse, or Lionès, a tract of land between Land's End and the Scilly Isles, now submerged "full forty fathoms under water." It formed a part of Cornwall. Thus sir Tristram de Lionès is always called a Cornish knight. When asked his name, he tells sir Kay that he is sir Tristram de Lionès, to which the seneschal answers, "Yet heard I never in no place that any good knight came out of Cornwall."—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, ii. 56 (1470). (See LIONESSE, p. 548.)

* * * Respecting the knights of Cornwall, sir Mark the king of Cornwall had thrown the whole district into bad odour. He was false, cowardly, mean, and most unknighly.

LII The Death of the Children of Lir. This is one of the three tragic stories of the ancient Irish. The other two are The

Death of the Children of Iouran and The Death of the Children of Usnach (See FIONNÜALA) — O'Flanagan, Transactions of the Gaelic Society, 1

* * * Lir (King) father of Fionnuala. On the death of Fingula (the mother of his daughter), he married the wicked Aoife, who, through spite, transformed the children of Lir into swans, doomed to float on the water for centuries, till they hear the first mass-bell ring. Tom Moore has versified this legend.

Silent, O Moyle be the roar of thy water Break not, ye breezes, your chain of repose—
While murmuring mournfully Lir's lonely daughter
Tells to the night-star her tale of woe.

Moore, Irish Melodies (Song of Fionnuala "1814)

Liris, a proud but lovely daughter of the race of man, beloved by Rabi, first of the angel host. Her passion was the love of knowledge, and she was captivated by all her angel lover told her of heaven and the works of God. At last she requested Rabi to appear before her in all his glory, and, as she fell into his embrace, was burnt to ashes by the rays which issued from him — T. Moore, Loves of the Angels, ii (1822)

Lisa, an innkeeper's daughter, who wishes to marry Elvino a wealthy farmer, but Elvino is in love with Ami'na. Suspicious circumstances make Elvino renounce his true love and promise marriage to Lisa, but the suspicion is shown to be baseless, and Lisa is discovered to be the paramour of another. So Elvino returns to his first love, and Lisa is left to Alessio, with whom she had been living previously — Bellini's opera, La Sonnambula (1831)

Lis'boa or Lisbo'a, Lisbon

Lisette Les Infidélités de Lisette and Les Gueux are the two songs which, in 1813, gained for Béranger admission to the "Caveau," a club of Paris, established in 1729 and broken up in 1749, but re-established in 1806 and finally closed in 1817.

Les Infidélités supposes that Béranger loved Lisette, who bestowed her favours on sundry admirers, and Béranger, at each new proof of infidelity, "drowned his sorrow in the bowl."

Lisette, ma Lisette,
Tu m'as troupé toujours
Mals vire la Lisette!
Je veux, Lisette,

Les Infidélités de Lisette.

Lismaha'go (Captain), a superannuated officer on half-pay, who marries Miss Tabitha Bramble for the sake of her £4000. He is a hard-featured, forbidding Scotchman, singular in dress, eccentric in manners, self-conceited, pedantic, disputatious, and rude. Though most tenacious in argument, he can yield to Miss Tabitha, whom he wishes to conciliate. Lismaha'go reminds one of don Quixote, but is sufficiently unlike to be original — T. Smollett, The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (1771)

Lissardo, valet to don Felix. He is a conceited high-life-below-stairs fop, who makes love to Inis and Flora — Mrs Centlivre, The Wonder (1713)

Lee Lewis (1730-1833) played "Lissardo" in the style of his great master (Woodward), and most divertingly — Boaden Life of Mrs Siddons.

Lisuarte (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series of Le Roman des Romains, or that pertaining to "Amadis of Gaul." This part was added by Juan Diaz.

Littamer, the painfully irreproachable valet of Steerforth, in whose presence David Copperfield feels always most uncomfortably small. Though as a valet he is propriety in Sunday best, he is nevertheless cunning and deceitful. Steerforth, tired of "Little Em'ly," wishes to marry her to Littamer, but from this lot she is rescued, and migrates to Australia — C. Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Little Britain, Brittany, also called Armorica, and in Arthurian romance Benwick or Benwick.

* * * There is a part of London called "Little Britain." It lies between Christ's Hospital (the Bine-court School) and Aldersgate Street. It was here that Mr Jagers had his chambers (See JAGGERS p. 486)

Little Corporal (The) General Bonaparte was so called after the battle of Lodi in 1796, from his youthful age and low stature.

Little Dorrit, the heroine and title of a novel by C. Dickens (1857). Little Dorrit was born and brought up in the Marshalsea prison, Bermondsey, where her father was confined for debt, and when about 11 years of age she used to do needlework, to earn a subsistence for herself and her father. The child had a pale, transparent face, quick in expression, though not beautiful in feature. Her eyes were a soft hazel, and her figure slight. The little dove of the prison was idolized by the prisoners, and when she walked out, every man in Bermondsey who passed her, touched or took off his hat out of respect to her good works and active benevolence. Her father, coming into a property, was set free at length, and Little Dorrit married Arthur Clennam, the marriage service being celebrated in the Marshalsea, by the prison chaplain.

Little-Endians and Big-Endians, two religious factions, which waged incessant war with each other on the right interpretation of the fifty-fourth chapter of the Blind's "All true believers break their eggs at the convenient end." The godfather of Calin Desir Plume, the reigning emperor of Lilliput, happened to cut his finger while breaking his egg at the big end, and therefore commanded all faithful Lilliputians to break their eggs in future at the small end. The Blefusendians called this decree rank heresy, and determined to exterminate the believers of such an abominable practice from the face of the earth. Hundreds of treatises were published on both sides, but each empire put all those books opposed to its own views into the Index Expurgatorius, and not a few of the more zealous sort died as martyrs for daring to follow their private judgment in the matter.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

Little French Lawyer (The), a comedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (1647). The person so called is La Wint, a wrangling French advocate.

Little Gentleman in Velvet (To the), a favourite Jacobite toast in the reign of queen Anne. The reference is to the mole that raised the hill against which the horse of William III. stumbled while riding in the park of Hampton Court. By this accident the king broke his collar-bone, a severe illness ensued, and he died in 1702.

Little John (whose surname was Naylor), the fidus Achat's of Robin Hood. He could shoot an arrow a measured mile and somewhat more. So could Robin Hood, but no other man ever lived who could perform the same feat. In one of the Robin Hood ballads we are told that the name of this free-shooter was John Little, and that William Stutely, in merry mood, reversed the names.

O here is my hand "the stranger replied
I'll serve you with all my whole heart
My name is John Little, a man of good mettle;
He or doubt me for I'll play my part."
He was, I must tell you, full seven foot high,
And may be an ell in the waste
Brave Stutely said then

Oh he;

he goes

* * A bow (says Ritson) which belonged to Little John, with the name Naylor on it, is now in the possession of a gentleman in the west riding of Yorkshire. Scott has introduced Little John in The Lullian (time, Richard I.)

Little John (Hugh). John Hugh Lockhart, grandson of sir W. Scott, is so called by sir Walter in his Tales of a Grandfather, written for his grandson.

Little Marlborough, count von Schwerin, a Prussian field-marshal and a companion of the duke of Marlborough (1684-1757).

Little Nell, a child distinguished for her purity of character, though living in the midst of selfishness, impurity, and crime. She was brought up by her grandfather, who was in his dotage, and having lost his property, tried to eke out a narrow living by selling lumber or curiosities. At length, through terror of Quilp, the old man and his grandchild stole away, and led a vagrant life, the one idea of both being to get as far as possible from the reach of Quilp. They finally settled down in a cottage overlooking a country churchyard, where Nell died.—C. Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop (1840).

Little Peddington, an imaginary place, the village of quackery and cant, egotism and humbug, affectation and flattery.—John Pools, Little Peddington.

Little Queen, Isabella of Valois, who was married at the age of eight years to Richard II. of England, and was a widow at 13 years of age (1387-1410).

Little Red Riding-Hood (Le Petit Chaperon Rouge), from Les Contes of

Charles Perrault (1697). Ludwig Tieck reproduced the same tale in his Volks-märchen (Popular Stories), in 1795, under the German title Leben und Tod des Klemen Rothhappchen. A little girl takes a present to her grandmother, but a wolf has assumed the place of the old woman, and, when the child gets into bed, devours her. The brothers Grimm have reproduced this tale in German in the Swedish version, Red Riding-Hood is a young woman, who takes refuge in a tree, the wolf gaws the tree, and the lover arrives just in time to see his mistress devoured by the monster.

Littlejohn (Baile), a magistrate at Fairport—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.)

Llaian, the unwed mother of prince Hoel. His father was prince Hoel, the illegitimate son of king Owen of North Wales. Hoel the father was slain in battle by his half-brother David, successor to the throne, and Llaian, with her young son, also called Hoel, accompanied prince Madoc to America—Southey, Madoc (1805)

Llewellyn, son of Iorwerth, and grandson of Owen king of North Wales. Iorwerth was the eldest son, but was set aside because he had a blemish in the face, and his half-brother David was king. David began his reign by killing or banishing all the family of his father who might disturb his succession. Amongst those he killed was Iorwerth, in consequence of which Llewellyn resolved to avenge his father's death, and his hatred against his uncle was unbounded—Southey, Madoc (1805)

Lloyd with an "L."

One morning a Welsh coach maker came with his bill to my lord (the earl of Brentford). You are called I think Mr Lloyd? "At your lordship's service," my lord. What! Lloyd with an L? "It was with an 'L'." In your part of the world I have heard that Lloyd and Filloyd are synonymous, is it so? "I inquired his lordship." "Very often indeed, my lord," was the reply. "You say that you spell your name with an L?" "Always," my lord. "That, Mr Lloyd is a little unlucky, for I am paying my debts alphabetically, and in four or five years you might have come in with the 'F's' but I am afraid I can give you no hopes for your 'L'." Good morning—S. Foote, The Lame Lover

Lloyd's Books, two enormous ledger-looking volumes, raised on desks at right and left of the entrance to Lloyd's Rooms. These books give the principal arrivals, and all losses by wreck, fire, or other accident at sea. The entries are written in a fine, bold, Roman hand, legible to all readers.

Loathly Lady (The), a hideous creature, whom Sir Gawain marries, and who immediately becomes a most beautiful woman—The Marriage of Sir Gawain (a ballad).

The walls were clothed with grim old tapestry, representing the memorable story of Sir Gawain's wedding with the Loathly Lady—Sir W. Scott.

Loba'ba, one of the sorecreers in the caverns of Dom-Daniel, "under the roots of the ocean." These spirits were destined to be destroyed by one of the race of Hoderah, and, therefore, they persecuted the whole of that race even to death. Thal'aba, however, escaped their malice, and became their destroyer. Okba tried to kill him, but failed. Abdalrah was next sent against him, and would have struck the lad in prayer, but was himself killed by a simoom. Lob'aba was the third envoy sent to compass his death. He assumed the guise of an old merchant, and beguiled the young man into the wilderness where he roused up a furious whirlwind, but Thalaba was saved, and Lob'aba himself fell a victim to the storm which he had raised—Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer (1797).

Loda or Cruth-Loda, a Scandinavian god, which dwelt "on the misty top of U-thorno the house of the spirits of men" Fingal did not worship at the "stone of this power," but looked on it as hostile to himself and friendly to his foes Hence, when Loda appeared to him on one occasion, Fingal knew it was with no friendly intent, and with his sword he cleft the intrenchant spirit in twain Whereupon it uttered a terrible shriek, which made the island tremble,

Lohengrin, "Knight of the Swan," son of Parzival. He came to Brabant in a ship drawn by a swan, and having liberated the duchess Elsen, who was a captive, he married her, but declined to reveal his name. Not long after his marriage, he went against the Huns and Saracens, performed marvels of bravery, and returned to Germany covered with glory. Elsen, being laughed at by her friends for not knowing the name of her husband, resolved to ask him of his family, but no sooner had she done so than the white swan re-appeared and carried him away — Wolfram von Eschenbach (a minnesinger, thirteenth century)

L'Oiseleur ("the bird-catcher"), the person who plays the magic flute — Mozart, Die Zauberflöte (1791)

Loki, the god of strife and spirit of all evil. His wife is Angerbode (4 syl), i. e. "messenger of wrath," and his three sons are Fenris, Midgard, and Hela. Loki gave the blind god Höder an arrow of mistletoe, and told him to try it, so the blind Höder discharged the arrow and slew Baldr (the Scandinavian Apollo). This calamity was so grievous to the gods, that they unanimously agreed to restore him to life again — Scandinavian Mythology

Yet at the dead of night, by Lonna's steep
The seaman's cry was heard along the deep Canto-ii, The Pleasures of Hope ii (1793).

Loose-Coat Field. The battle of Stamford (1470) was so called, because the men led by Lord Wells, being attacked by the Yorkists, threw off their coats, that they might flee the faster

Cast off their country's coats, to haste their speed away
Which Loose-Coat Field is called even to this day
Dryden, Polyolbion xiii (1622).

Lope de Vega (Flix), a Spanish poet, born at Madrid. He was one of those who came in the famous "Armada" to invade England. Lope (2 syl) wrote altogether 1690 tragedies, comedies, dramas, or religious pieces called autos sacramentales (1562-1635)

Her memory was a mine, Fire knew by heart
All Calderon and greater part of Lope
Byron Don Juan, l. 11 (1818).

Lopez, the "Spanish curate"—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Spanish Curate (1622)

Lopez (Don), a Portuguese nobleman, the father of don Iehv and donna

Isabella—Mrs Centlivre, The Wonder (1714).

Lorbrul'grud, the capital of Broddingnag. The word is humorously said to mean "Pride of the Universe"—Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Broddingnag," 1726)

Lord, a hunchback (Greek, lordos, "crooked")

Lord Peter. The pope is so called in Dr Arbuthnot's History of John Bull. Swift, in his Tale of a Tub, introduces the three brothers Peter, John, and Martin meaning the pope, Calvin, and Luther

Lord Strutt. Charles II of Spain is so called by Dr Arbuthnot, in his History of John Bull (1712)

Every one must remember the paroxysm of rage into which poor Lord Strutt fell, on hearing that his runaway servant Nic. Frog, his clothier John Bull, and his old enemy Lewis Baboon had come with quadrants, poles, and ink horns, to survey his estate, and to draw his will for him.—Macaulay

Lord Thomas and Annet had a lovers' quarrel, whereupon, Lord Thomas, in his temper, went and offered marriage to the nut-brown maid who had houses and lands. On the wedding day, Annet went to the church, and Lord Thomas gave her a rose, but the nut-brown maid killed her with a "bodkin from her head-gear." Lord Thomas, seeing Annet fall, plunged his dagger into the heart of the murderess, and then stabbed himself. Over the graves of Lord Thomas and the fair Annet grew "a bonny briar, and by this ye may ken that they were lovers dear." In some versions of this story Annet is called "Linor"—Percy, Reliques, etc., III. iii

Lord of Crazy Castle, John Hall Stevenson, author of Crazy Tales (in verse). J. H. Stevenson lived at Skelton Castle, which was nicknamed "Crazy Castle" (1718-1758)

Lord of the Isles, Donald of Islay, who in 1346 reduced the Hebrides under his sway. The title of "lord of the Isles" had been borne by others for centuries before, was borne by Stevenson's successors, and is now one of the titles of the prince of Wales

Sir W. Scott has a metrical romance entitled The Lord of the Isles (1815)

Loredani (Giacomo) interpreter of King Richard I—Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I.)

Loredano (James), a Venetian patrician, and one of the Council of

Ten Loredano was the personal enemy of the Los'cari — Byron, The Two Foscari (1820)

Loren'zo, a young man with whom Jessica, the daughter of the Jew Shylock, elopes — Shakespeare, The Merchant of Venice (1698)

Lorenzo, an atheist and reprobate, whose remorse ends in despair — Dr Young, Night Thoughts (1742-6)

* * Some affirm that Lorenzo is meant for the poet's own son

Lorenzo (Colonel), a young libertine in Dryden's drama, The Spanish Fryar (1680)

Loretto (The House of) The Santa Casa is the reputed house of the virgin Mary at Nazareth. It was miraculously translated to Lume, in Dalmatia, in 1291, thence to Recanati in 1294, and finally to Macerata, in Italy, to a plot of land belonging to the lady Loretto

Our house may have travelled through the air like the house of Loretto for aught I care — Gosmith, The Good-natured Man iv 1 (1768)

Loretto of Austria, Mariazel ("Mary in the cell"), in Styria. So called from the miracle-working image of the Virgin. The image is old and very ugly. Two pilgrimages are made to it yearly

Loretto of Switzerland. Einsiedlen, a village containing a shrine of the "Black Lady of Switzerland." The church is of black marble, and the image of ebony

Lorimer, one of the guard at Ardenorville Castle — Sir W. Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.)

Loriot, "the confidante and servant" of Louis XV. Loriot was the inventor of lifts, by which tables descended, and rose again covered with vands and wines

The shifting eld-board plays its humble part
Beyond the triumphs of a Loriot's art

E. Rogers, I just came to a Friend (1798)

Lorma, wife of Erragon king of Sora, in Scandinavia. She fell in love with Aldo, a Caledonian officer in the king's army. The guilty pair escaped to Morven, which Erragon forthwith invaded. Erragon encountered Aldo in single combat, and slew him, was himself slain in battle by Gaul son of Morni, and Lorma died of grief — Ossian, The Battle of Lora Lorn (McDougal of), a Highland in the army of Montrose — Sir W.

Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.)

Lornequei (Harry), the hero and title of a military novel by Charles Lever

Lor'rimite (3 syl), a malignant witch, who abetted and aided Arvalan in his persecutions of Kail'yal the beautiful and holy daughter of Ladur'lad — Southey, Curse of Kehama, vi (1809)

Lorry (Jarvis), one of the firm in Tellson's bank, Temple Bar, and a friend of Dr Manette. Jarvis Lorry was orderly, precise, and methodical, but tender-hearted and affectionate

He had a good leg and was a little vain of it and his little sleek, crisp, flaxen wig looked as if it was spun silk. His face habitually suppressed and quiet was lighted up by a pair of moist bright eyes — Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities l. 4 (1853)

Losberne (2 syl), the medical man called in by Mrs Maylie to attend Oliver Twist, after the attempted burglary by Bill Sikes and his associates — Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Lost Island. Cephalonia is so called, because "it was only by chance that those who visited it could find it again." It is sometimes called "The Hidden Island."

Lot, consul of Londonesia, and afterwards king of Norway. He was brother of Urian and Angusel, and married Anne (own sister of King Arthur), by whom he had two sons, Walgan and Modred — Geoffrey, British History, viii 21, ix 9, 10 (1142)

* * This account differs so widely from that of Arthurian romance, that it is not possible to reconcile them. In the History of Prince Arthur, Lot king of Orkney marries Margawse the "sister of King Arthur" (pt 1 2). Tennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, says that Lot's wife was Bellicent. Again, the sons of Lot are called, in the History, Gaw'nin, Agravain, Gaheris, and Gareth, Mordred is their half-brother, being the son of King Arthur and the same mother — Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 2, 36, 36 (1476)

Lot, king of Orkney. According to the Morte d'Arthur, king Lot's wife was Margawse or Morgawse, sister of King Arthur, and their sons were Sir Gaw'nin, Sir Agravain, Sir Gaheris, and Sir Gareth — Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 36 (1470)

Once or twice Blain is called the wife of Lot, but this is a mistake. Flain was Arthur's sister by the same mother, and was the wife of sir Nentres of Calot. Mordred was the son of Morgause by her brother Arthur, and consequently Gawain, Agravain, Gaheris, and Gareth were his half-brothers.

Lot, king of Orkney. According to Tennyson, king Lot's wife was Bellicent, daughter of Gorlois lord of Tintagel Castle, in Cornwall, and Lot was the father of Gawain (2 syl) and Modred. This account differs entirely from the History of Prince Arthur, by sir T. Malory. There the wife of Lot is called Margause or Morgause (Arthur's sister). Geoffrey of Monmouth, on the other hand, calls her Anne (Arthur's sister). The sons of Lot, according to the History, were Gawain, Agravain, Gaheris, and Gareth, Modred or Mordred being the offspring of Morgause and Arthur. This ignoble birth the History assigns as the reason of Mordred's hatred to king Arthur, his adulterous father and uncle. Lot was subdued by king Arthur, fighting on behalf of Leodogran or Leodogranee king of Cam'elard—See Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

Lot's Wife, Wihela, who was confederate with the men of Sodom, and gave them notice when any stranger came to lodge in the house. Her sign was smoke by day and fire by night. Lot's wife was turned into a pillar of salt—Jallalo'ddin, Al Zama'h.

Lothario, a noble cavalier of Florence, the friend of Anselmo. Anselmo induced him to put the fidelity of his wife Camilla to the test, that he might rejoice in her incorruptible virtue, but Camilla was not trial-proof, and eloped with Lothario. Anselmo then died of grief, Lothario was slain in battle, and Camilla died in a convent—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I iv 5, 6 ("Fatal Curiosity," 605).

Lothario, a young Genoese nobleman, "braght, gallant, gay, and perfidious." He seduced Calista, daughter of Sciolto (3 syl) a Genoese nobleman, and was killed in a duel by Altramont the husband. This is the "gay Lothario," which has become a household word for a libertine and male coquette—N. Rowe, The Fair Penitent (1703).

Is this the haughty gallant, gay Lothario?
Rowe The Fair Penitent

* * * The Fair Penitent is taken from

Massinger's Fatal Dowry, in which Lothario is called "Novall, Junior."

Lothian (Scotland). So named from Llew, second son of Arthur, also called Lotus and Lotius. Arthur's eldest son was Urian, and his youngest Arwun.

* * * In some legends, Lothian is made the father of Modred or Medrunt, leader of the rebellious army which fought at Camlann, A.D. 537, in which Arthur received his death-wound, but in Malory's collection, called The History of Prince Arthur, Modred is called the son of Arthur by his own sister the wife of king Lot.

Lotte (2 syl), a young woman of strong affection and domestic winning ways, the wife of Albert a young German farmer. Werther loved Lotte when she was only betrothed to Albert, and continued to love her after she became a young wife. His mewing and pining after this "forbidden fruit," which terminates in suicide, make up the sum and substance of the tale, which is told in the form of letters addressed to divers persons—Goethe, Sorrows of Werther (1774).

"Lotte" was Charlotte Buff, who married Kestner, Goethe's friend, the "Albert" of the novel. Goethe was in love with Charlotte Buff, and her marriage with Kestner soured the temper of his over-sensitive mind.

Lotus-Eaters or Lotophagi, a people who ate of the lotus tree, the effect of which was to make them forget their friends and homes, and to lose all desire of returning to their native land. The lotus-eater only cares to live in ease, luxury, and idleness—Homer, Odyssey, vi.

* * * Tennyson has a poem called The Lotus-Eaters, a set of islanders who live in a dreamy idleness, weary of life, and regardless of all its stirring events.

Louis, duc d'Orléans—Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV).

Louis de Bourbon, the prince-bishop of Liège [Le aye]—Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV).

Louis IX. The sum of the figures which designate the birth-date of this king will give his titular number. Thus, he was born in 1215, the sum of which figures is 9. This is true of several other kings. The discovery might form an occasional diversion on a dull evening (See Louis XVIII.)

Louis XI of France, introduced by sir W Scott in two novels, Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

* * In Quentin Durward he appears first disguised as Maitre Pierre, a merchant

Louis XIII of France, "infirm in health, in mind more feeble, and Richelieu's plaything"—Lord Lytton, Richelieu (1839)

Louis XIV It is rather remarkable that the number 14 is obtained by adding together the figures of his age at death, the figures which make the date of his coronation, and the figures of the date of his death For example

Age 77 which added together = 14
Crowned 1641 which added together = 14
Died 1715 which added together = 14

Louis XIV and La Vallière Louis XIV fell in love with La Vallière, a young lady in the queen's train He overheard the ladies chatting One said, "How handsome looks the duke de Guiche to-night!" Another said, "Well, to my taste, the graceful Grammont bears the bell from all" A third remarked, "But, then, that charming Lauzun has so much wit" But La Vallière said, "I scarcely marked them When the king is by, who can have eyes, or ears, or thought for others?" and when the others chaffed her, she replied

Who spoke of love?
The sunflower gazing on the lord of heaven
Asks but its sun to shine. Who spoke of love?
And who would wish the bright and lofty Louis
To stoop from glory!

Act I 5

Louis degraded this ethereal spirit into a "soiled dove," and when she fled to a convent to quiet remorse, he fetched her out and took her to Versailles Wholly unable to appreciate such love as that of La Vallière, he discarded her for Mde de Montespan, and bade La Vallière marry some one She obeyed the selfish monarch in word, by taking the veil of a Carmelite nun—Lord Lytton, The Duchess de la Vallière (1836)

Louis XIV and his Coach It was lord Stair and not the duke of Chesterfield whom the Grand Monarque commended for his tact in entering the royal carriage before his majesty, when politely bidden by him so to do

Louis XVIII, nicknamed Des-lustres, because he was a great feeder, like all the Bourbons, and especially fond of oysters Of course the pun is on dix-huit (18)

As in the case of Louis IX (q v), the sum of the figures which designate the birth-date of Louis XVIII give his titular number Thus, he was born 1755, which added together equal 18

Louis Philippe of France It is somewhat curious that the year of his birth, or the year of the queen's birth, or the year of his flight, added to the year of his coronation, will give the year 1848, the date of his abdication He was born 1773, his queen was born 1782, his flight was in 1809, whence we get 1830	1830	1830	year of coronation.

1 7 3	1 7 8	1 5 0
} birth		} flight
1848	1848	1848	year of abdication.

(See NAPOLEON III for a somewhat similar coincidence)

Louisa, daughter of don Jerome of Seville, in love with don Antonio Her father insists on her marrying Isaac Mendoza, a Portuguese Jew, and, as she refuses to obey him, he determines to lock her up in her chamber In his blind rage, he makes a great mistake, for he locks up the duenna, and turns his daughter out of doors Isaac arrives, is introduced to the locked-up lady, elopes with her, and marries her Louisa takes refuge in St Catherine's Convent, and writes to her father for his consent to her marriage with the man of her choice As don Jerome takes it for granted she means Isaac the Jew, he gives his consent freely At breakfast-time it is discovered by the old man that Isaac has married the duenna, and Louisa don Antonio, but don Jerome is well pleased and fully satisfied—Sheridan, The Duenna (1775)

Mrs Mattocks (1745-1826) was the first "Louisa"

Louisa, daughter of Russet bailiff to the duchess She was engaged to Henry, a private in the king's army Hearing a rumour of gallantry to the disadvantage of her lover, she consented to put his love to the test by pretending that she was about to marry Simkin When Henry heard thereof, he gave himself up as a deserter, and was condemned to death Louisa then went to the king to explain the whole matter, and returned with the young man's pardon just as the muffled drums began the death march—Dibdin, The Deserter (1770)

Louise (2 syl), the glee-maiden—

Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Louise [de Lascours], wife of Ralph captain of the Urama, and mother of Martha (afterwards called Organita) Louise de Lascours sailed with her infant daughter and her husband in the Urama Louise and the captain were drowned by the breaking up of an iceberg, but Martha was rescued by some wild Indians, who brought her up, and called her name Organita ("withered wheat")—E Stirling, Orphan of the Frozen Sea (1856)

Loupgarou, leader of the army of giants in alliance with the Dipsodes (2 syl) As he threatened to make mincemeat of Pantagruel, the prince gave him a kick which overthrew him, then, lifting him up by his ankles, he used him as a quarter-staff Having killed all the giants in the hostile army, Pantagruel hung the body of Loupgarou on the ground, and, by so doing, crushed a tom-cat, a tabby, a duck, and a brindled goose—Rabelais, Pantagruel, ii 29 (1533)

Louponheight (The young laird of), at the ball at Middlemas—Sir W Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Lourdís, an idiotic scholar of Sorbonne

De la Sorbonne un Docteur amoureux

Je ne puis rien meriter de vous belle"
Arguo sir Si magister Lourdís
De sa Catlin merlier ne peut rien
Ergo ne peut meriter paradis,
Car pour le moins, paradis lá vaut bien "
Marot, Epigram.

When Doctor Lourdís cried in humble spirit,
The hand of hath rive he could never merit
Then heaven to thee "said Kate, can ne'er be given For less my worth, you must allow than heaven "

Lourie (Tam), the innkeeper at Marchthorn—Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III)

Louvre (The), a corruption of lupara, as it is called in old title-deeds Dagobert built here a hunting-box, the nucleus of the present pile of buildings

Louvre of St Petersburg (The), the Hermitage, an imperial museum

Love, a drama by S Knowles (1840) The countess Catherine is taught by a serf named Huon who is her secretary, and falls in love with him, but her pride struggles against such an unequal match The duke, her father, hearing of his daughter's love, commands Huon, on pain of death, to marry Catherine a freed serf. He refuses, but the countess herself bids him obey He plights his troth to Catherine, supposing it to be Catherine the quondam serf, rushes to the wars, obtains great honours, becomes a prince, and then learns that the Catherine he has wed is the duke's daughter

Love, or rather affection, according to Plato, is disposed in the liver

With-

Ph. Fletcher The Purple Island (1633)

Love "Man's love is of man's life a thing apart, 'his woman's whole existence"—Byron, Don Juan, i. 191 (1819).

Love

It is better to have loved and lost,
Than never to have loved at all.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, xiv

Thomas Moore, in his Irish Melodies, expresses an opposite opinion

Better far to be
In endless darkness lying Than be in light and see
That light for ever flying.
All that a bright man's fade

Love All for Love or the World Well Lost, a tragedy by Dryden, on the same subject as Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra (1679)

Love à-la-Mode, by C Macklin (1779) The "love a-la-mode" is that of fortune-hunters Charlotte Goodchild is courted by a Scotchman "of ponderous descent," an Italian Jew broker of great fortune, and an Irishman in the Prussian army It is given out that Charlotte has lost her money through the bankruptcy of sir Theodore Goodchild, her guardian Upon this, the a-la-mode suitors withdraw, and leave sir Callaghan O'Brallighan, the true lover, master of the situation The tale about the bankruptcy is of course a mere myth

Love cannot Die

They sin who tell us Love can die
With life all other pa dons fy
They perish where they have their birth,
But Love is indestructible.
His holy flame for ever burneth,
From heaven it came to heaven returneth
It soweth here in toil and care
But the harvest time of Love is there.
Southey, Curse of Kehama x. 10 (1825)

Love-Chase (The), a drama by S. Knowles (1837) Three lovers chased three beloved ones with a view to marriage (1) Waller loves Lydia, lady's-maid to Widow Green, but in reality the sister of Truworth. She quitted home to avoid a hateful marriage, and took service for the nonce with Widow Green. (2) Willrake loves Constance, daughter of sir William Fondlove. (3) Sir William Fondlove, aged 60, loves Widow Green, aged 10. The difficulties to be overcome were these. The social position of Lady galled the aristocratic pride of Waller, but love won the day. Willrake and Constance spinned with each other, and hardly knew they loved till it dawned upon them that each might prefer some other, and then they felt that the loss would be irreparable. Widow Green set her heart on marryin, Waller, but as Waller preferred Lady, she accepted sir William for better or worse.

Love Doctor (Thc), L'Amour Médecin, a comedy by Molière (1665). Lucinde, the daughter of Sganarelle, is in love, and the father calls in four doctors to consult upon the nature of her malady. They see the patient, and retire to consult together, but talk about Paris, about their visits, about the topics of the day, and when the father enters to know what opinion they have formed, they all prescribe different remedies, and pronounce different opinions. Tisette then calls in a "quack" doctor (Clitandre, the lover), who says that he must act on the imagination, and proposes a seeming marriage, to which Sganarelle assents, saying, "Voilà un grand médecin." The assistant being a notary, Clitandre and Lucinde are formally married.

* * This comedy is the basis of the Quack Doctor, by Foote and Bickerstaff, only in the English version Mr Ailwood is the patient.

Love in a Village, an opera by Isaac Bickerstaff. It contains two plots: the loves of Rosetta and young Meadows, and the loves of Lucinda and Jack Justace. The entanglement is this: Rosetta's father wanted her to marry young Meadows, and sir William Meadows wanted his son to marry Rosetta, but as the young people had never seen each other, they turned restive and ran away. It so happened that both took service with justice Wandcoek—Rosetta as chamber-maid, and Meadows as gardener. Here they fell in love with each other, and ultimately married, to the delight of all concerned. The other part of the plot is this:

Lucinda was the daughter of justice

Wandcoek, and fell in love with Jack Justace while nursing her sick mother, who died. The justice had never seen the young man, but resolutely forbade the connection, whereupon Jack Justace entered the house as a music-master, and, by the kind offices of friends, all came right at last.

Love Makes a Man, a comedy connected by Colley Cibber by welding together two of the comedies of Beaumont and Fletcher, viz., the Old Brother and the Custom of the Country. Carlos, a young student (son of Antonio), sees Angelina, the daughter of Charino, and falls in love with her. His character instantly changes, and the modest, diffident boy soon becomes energetic, manly, and resolute. Angelina is persuaded by her father to Clodio a coxcomb, the younger brother of Carlos, but the student elopes with her. They are taken captives, but meet after several adventures, and become duly engaged. Clodio, who goes in search of the fugitives, meets with Iliara, to whom he engages himself, and thus leaves the field open to his brother Carlos.

Love-Producers

It is a Basque superstition that yellow hair in a man is irresistible with women, hence every woman who set eyes on Irlabi Iudel, the golden-haired, fell in love with him.

It is a West Highland superstition that a beauty spot cannot be resisted, hence Diarmid inspired masterless love by a beauty spot.

In Greek fable, a cestus worn by a woman inspired love, hence Aphrodite was irresistible on account of her cestus.

In the Middle Ages, love-powders were advertised for sale, and a wise senator of Venice was not ashamed to urge on his reverend brethren, as a fact, that Othello had won the love of Desdemona "by foul charms," drugs, minerals, spells, potions of mountebanks, or some dram "powerful o'er the blood" to awaken love.

Theocritus and Virgil have both introduced in their pastorals women using charms and incantations to inspire or recover the affection of the opposite sex.

Gai, in the Shepherd's Week, makes the mistress of Lubberkin spend all her money in buying a love-powder. Froissart says that Gaston, son of the count de Lora, received a bag of powder from his uncle (Charles the Bad) for restoring the love of his father to his mother. The love of Tristram and Isold is attributed to their drinking on their journey a love-potion designed for king Mark, the intended husband of the fair princess.

An Irish superstition is that if a lover will run a hair of the object beloved through the fleshy part of a dead man's leg, the person from whom the hair was taken will go mad with love.

We are told that Charlemagne was bewitched by a ring, and that he followed any one who possessed this ring as a needle follows a loadstone (see p. 177).

 To do justice to this subject would require several pages, and all that can be done here is to give a few brief hints and examples.

Love's Labour's Lost Ferdinand king of Navarre, with three lords named Biron, Dumain, and Longaville, agreed to spend three years in study, during which time no woman was to approach the court. Scarcely had they signed the compact, when the princess of France, attended by Rosaline, Maria, and Katharine, besought an interview respecting certain debts said to be due from the king of France to the king of Navarre. The four gentlemen fell in love with the four ladies: the king with the princess, Biron with Rosaline, Longaville with Maria, and Dumain with Katharine. In order to carry their suits, the four gentlemen, disguised as Muscovites, presented themselves before the ladies, but the ladies, being warned of the masquerade, disguised themselves also, so that the gentlemen in every case addressed the wrong lady. However, it was at length arranged that the suits should be deferred for twelve months and a day, and if, at the expiration of that time, they remained of the same mind, the matter should be taken into serious consideration.—Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Loves of the Angels, the stories of three angels, in verse, by T. Moore (1822). The stories are founded on the Eastern tale of Harut and Marut, and the rabbinical fictions of the loves of Uzziel and Shamchazon.

1 The first angel fell in love with Lea, whom he saw bathing. She returned love for love, but his love was carnal, hers heavenly. He loved the woman, she loved the angel. One day, the angel told her the spell-word which opens the gates of heaven. She pronounced it, and rose through the air into paradise, while the angel became imbruted, being no longer an angel of light, but "of the earth, earthy."

2 The second angel was Rubi, one of the seraphs. He fell in love with Liris, who asked him to come in all his celestial glory. He did so, and she, rushing into his arms, was burnt to death, but the kiss she gave him became a brand on his face for ever.

3 The third angel was Zaraph, who loved Nama. It was Nama's desire to love without control, and to love holily, but as she fixed her love on a creature, and not on the Creator, both she and Zaraph were doomed to live among the things that perish, till this mortal is swallowed up of immortality, when Nama and Zaraph will be admitted into the realms of everlasting love.

Love's White Star, the planet Venus, which is silvery white.

Till every daisy leapt and Love's white star
Beamed thro' the thickened cedar in the dusk.
Tennyson The Gardener's Daughter

Loved Who ever loved that loved not at first sight?—Marlowe, Hero and Leander (1637).

Lovegold, the miser, an old man of 60, who wants to marry Marriana, his son's sweetheart. In order to divert him from this folly, Marriana pretends to be very extravagant, and orders a neck-lace and ear-rings for £3000, a petticoat and gown from a fabric £12 a yard, and besets the house with duns. Lovegold gives £2000 to be let off the bargain, and Marriana marries the son.—A. Fielding, The Miser (a réchauffé of L'Avare, by Molière).

John Emery (1777-1822) made his first appearance at Covent Garden Theatre in the year 1793 in very opposite characters. "Frank Oakland" in A Cure for the Heart ache (by Morton) and in "Lovegold." In both which parts he obtained great applause.—Memoir (1822).

Love'good (2 syl), uncle to Valentine the gallant who will not be persuaded to keep his estate.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Wit without Money (1639).

Lovel, once the page of lord Beaufort, in love with lady Frances, but he concealed his love because young Beaufort "cast his affections first upon the lady"—Murphy, The Citizen (1757).

Lorel (Lord), the bridegroom who lost his bride on the wedding day from playing hide-and-seek. The lady hid in an old oak chest, the lid of which fell on her and closed with a spring-lock. Many years afterwards the chest was sold, and the skeleton of the maiden revealed the mystery of her disappearance—T H Bayley, The Mistletoe Bough.

Samuel Rogers has introduced this story in his Italy (pt 1 18, 1822). He says the bride was Ginevra, only child of Orsini "an indulgent father," and that the bridegroom was Francesco Doria, "her playmate from birth, and her first love." The chest, he says, was an heirloom, "richly carved by Antony of Trent, with Scripture stories from the life of Christ." It came from Venice, and had "held the ducal robes of some old ancestor." After the accident, Francesco, weary of life, flew to Venice, and "slung his life away in battle with the Turk." Orsini went deranged, and spent the life-long day "wandering in quest of something he could not find." It was fifty years afterwards that the skeleton was discovered in the chest.

Collet, in his Relics of Literature, gives a similar story.

In the Causes Célèbres is another example.

A similar story is attached to Marwell Old Hall, once the residence of the Seymours, and subsequently of the Daere family, and "the very chest is now the property of the Rev J Haygarth, rector of Upham"—Post-Office Directory.

The same tale is told of a chest in Bramishall, Hampshire, and also of a chest in the great house at Malsanger, near Basingstoke.

Lovel (Lord), in Clara Reeve's tale called The Old English Baron, appears as a ghost in the obscurity of a dim religious light (1777).

Lovel (Percy), a wealthy commoner, who suspects his servants of wasting his substance in riotous living, so, giving out that he is going down to his country seat in Devonshire, he returns in the disguise of an Essex bumpkin, and places himself under the care of Philip, the butler, to be wretched the duties of a gentleman's servant. Lovel finds that Philip has invited a large party to supper, that the servants assembled assume the titles and airs of masters and mistresses, and that the wines of the cellar are set before him. In the midst of the banquet, he hears before the party in his real character, breaks up the revel, and dismisses the household except Tom, whom he leaves in charge of the cellar and plate—

Rev J Townley, High Life Below Stairs (1759).

Lovel (William), the hero of a German novel so called, by Ludwig Tieck (1778-1853) (See LOVELL).

Love'lace (2 syl), the chief male character in Richardson's novel of Clarissa Harlowe. He is rich, proud, and crafty, handsome, brave, and gay, the most unscrupulous but finished libertine, always self-possessed, insinuating, and polished (1749).

Love'lace "is as great an improvement on Lothario from which it was drawn, as Rowe's hero (in the Fair Penitent) had been on the vulgar rake of Massinger—Encyc Brit., Art. Romance."

Love'lace (2 syl), a young aristocrat, who angles with flattery for the daughter of Mr Drugget, a rich London tradesman. He fools the vulgar tradesman to the top of his bent, and stands well with him, but, being too confident of his influence, demurs to the suggestion of the old man to cut two fine yew trees at the head of the carriage drive into a Gog and Magog. Drugget is intensely angry, throws off the young man, and gives his daughter to a Mr Woodley—A Murphy, Three Weeks after Marriage.

Love'less (The Elder), suitor to "The Scornful Lady" (no name given).

The Younger Loveless, a prodigal—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Scornful Lady (1616).

Loveless (Edward), husband of Amanda. He pays undue attention to Berinthia, a handsome young widow, his wife's cousin, but, seeing the folly of his conduct, he resolves in future to devote himself to his wife with more fidelity—Sheridan, A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

Lovell (Benjamin), a banker, proud of his ancestry, but with a weakness for gambling.

Else Lovell, his daughter, in love with Victor Orme the poor gentleman—Wybert Reeve, Parted.

Lovell (Lord). Sir Giles Overreach fully expected that his lordship would marry his daughter Margaret, but he married Lady Allworth, and assisted Margaret in marrying Tom Allworth, the man of her choice (See LOVELL)—Massinger, A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1628).

Lovely Obscure (The), Am'adis of Gaul. Same as Belten'ebros.

The great Amadis, when he assumed the name of The Lovely Obscure, dwelt either eight years or eight months. I forget which upon a naked rock, doing penance for some unkindness shown him by the lady Oriana. [The rock is called The Poor Rock].—Cervantes, Don Quixote I. III. 1 (1605)

Love'more (2 syl), a man fond of gaiety and pleasure, who sincerely loves his wife, but, finding his home dull, and that his wife makes no effort to relieve its monotony, seeks pleasure abroad, and treats his wife with cold civility and formal politeness. He is driven to intrigue, but, being brought to see its folly, acknowledges his faults, and his wife resolves "to try to keep him" by making his home more lively and agreeable.

Mrs Love-more (2 syl), wife of Mr Love-more, who finds if "she would keep her husband" to herself, it is not enough to "be a prudent manager, careless of her own comforts, not much given to pleasure, grave, retired, and domestic, to govern her household, pay the tradesmen's bills, and love her husband," but to these must be added some effort to please and amuse him, and to make his home bright and agreeable to him.—A. Murphy, The Way to Keep Him (1760)

Lovers Struck by Lightning, John Hewitt and Sarah Drew of Stanton Hareourt, near Oxford (July 31, 1718). Gay gives a full description of the incident in one of his letters. On the morning that they obtained the consent of their parents to the match, they went together into a field to gather wild flowers, when a thunderstorm overtook them and both were killed. Pope wrote their epitaph

* * Probably Thomson had this incident in view in his tale of Caladon and Armelia—See Seasons ("Summer," 1727)

Lovers' Leap The leap from the Leuca'di in promontory into the sea. This promontory is in the island of Leuca or Leuca'di, in the Ionian Sea. Sappho threw herself therefrom when she found her love for Phaon was not requited.

A precipice on the Guadalupe (1 syl), from which Mannet and Laila cast themselves, is also called "The Lovers' Leap" (See LAILA.)

Lovers' Vows, altered from Kotzebue's drama by Mrs. Inchbald (1800). Baron Wildenbrum, in his youth, seduced Agatha Irburg, and then forsook her. She had a son Frederick who in due time became a soldier. While on furlough, he came to spend his time with his mother, and found her reduced to abject poverty and almost starved to death. A poor cottager took her in, while Frederick, who had no money, went to beg charity. Count Wildenbrum was out with his gun, and Frederick asked alms of him. The count gave him a shilling, Frederick demanded more, and, being refused, seized the baron by the throat. The keepers soon came up, collared him, and put him in the castle dungeon. Here he was visited by the chaplain, and it came out that the count was his father. The chaplain being appealed to, told the count the only reparation he could make would be to marry Agatha and acknowledge the young soldier to be his son. This advice he followed, and Agatha Irburg, the beggar, became the baroness Wildenbrum of Wildenbrum Castle.

Love-rule (Sir John), a very pleasant gentleman, but wholly incapable of ruling his wife, who led him a miserable dance.

Lady Lovemore, a violent termagant, who beat her servants, scolded her husband, and kept her house in constant hot water, but was reformed by Isabel Jobson the cobbler. (See DRYIN TO PAY)—C. Coffey, The Devil to Pay (died 1715).

Love'well, the husband of Fanny Blerling, to whom he has been clandestinely married for four months—Colman and Garriek, The Clandestine Marriage (1766).

Loving-Land, a place where Neptune held his "nymphall" or feast given to his nymphs, (See his Trifles, made proclain a nymphall to be held in honour of himself in Loving-Land, where he The most selected nymphs were invited to be. Drayton Polycrion, xi. (1622).

Lovinski (Baron), the friend of prince Lupanski, under whose charge the princess Iodora (1 syl) is placed during a war between the Poles and the Tartars. Lovinski betrays his trust by keeping the princess a virtual prisoner because she will not accept him as a lover. The count Iloreski makes his way into the castle, and the baron seeks to poison him, but at this crisis the Tartars invade the castle, the baron is slain, and Iloreski marries the princess—J. P. Kemble, Iodora (a melodrama).

Low-Heels and High-Heels, two factions in Lilliput. The High-heels were opposed to the emperor, who wore low heels and employed Low-heels in his cabinet. Of course the Low-heels are the whigs and low-church party, and the High-heels the tories and high-church party. (See BIR-ROBINS)—Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1727).

Lowestoffe (Reginald), a young Templar—Sir W. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Lowthor (Jack), a smuggler—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Loyal Subject (The), Archias general of the Muscovites, and the father of colonel Theodore—Beumont and Iletcher, The Loyal Subject (1618).

Loyale Epée (La), "the honest soldier," marshal de MacMahon (1808, president of France from 1873 to 1879, died)

Loys de Dreux, a young Breton nobleman, who joined the Druses, and was appointed their prefect.

Loys (1 syl) the boy stood on the leading prow conspicuous in his gay attire.

Robert Browning, The Return of the Druses I.

Lunath (2 syl), Cuthullin's "swift-footed hound"—Ossian, Ingulf, ii. Ingulf had a dog called "Lunath" and another called "Bran."

In Robert Burns's poem, called The Two Dogs, the poor man's dog which represents the peasantry is called "Lunath," and the gentleman's dog is "Cæsar."

Lubar, a river of Ulster, which flows between the two mountains Cromlech and Crommull—Ossian.

Lubber-Land or Cognac (2 syl), London

The golden age was represented in the same ridiculous mode of description as the Pays de la Cognac of the French minstrels, or the popular ideas of Lubber land in England.—Sir W. Scott, The Drama.

Lucan (Sir), sometimes called "sir Lucas," butler of king Arthur, and a knight of the Round Table—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur ("Lucan," ii 160, "Lucas," ii 78, 1470)

Lucasta, whom Richard Lovelace celebrates, was Lucy Sichel crell (Lucy-casta or Lux casta, "chaste light")

Lucentio, son of Vicentio of Pisa. He marries Bianca sister of Katharina "the Shrew" of Padua—Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew (1594)

Lucetta, waiting-woman of Julia the lady-love of Protheus (one of the heroes of the play)—Shakespeare, The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1594)

Lu'cia, daughter of Lucius (one of the friends of Cato at Utica, and a member of the mimic senate). Lucia was loved by both the sons of Cato, but she preferred the more temperate Porcius to the chement Marcus. Marcus being slain, left the field open to the elder brother—Addison, Cato (1713)

Lu'cia, in The Cheats of Scapin, Otrav's version of Les Fourberies de Scapin, by Molière. Lucia, in Molière's comedy, is called "Zerbinette," her father Thrifty is called "Argante," her brother Octavian is "Octave," and her sweetheart Leander son of Gripe is called by Molière "Leandre son of Géronte" (2 syl)

Lucia (St) Struck on St Lucia's thorn, on the rack, in torment, much perplexed and annoyed. St Lucia was a virgin martyr, put to death at Syracuse in 304. Her fete-day is December 13. "the thorn" referred to is in reality the point of a sword, shown in all paintings of the saint, protruding through the neck.

If I don't recruit I shall be struck upon St. Lucia's thorn.—Cervantes Don Quixote II. I. 3 (1613)

Lucia di Lammermoor, called by sir W. Scott "Lucy Ashton," sister of lord Henry Ashton of Lammermoor. In order to retrieve the broken fortune of the family, lord Henry arranged a marriage between his sister and lord Arthur Bucklaw, alias Frank Hayston laird of Bucklaw. Unknown to the brother, Edgardo (Lady) master of Ravenswood (whose family had long had a feud with the Lammermoors) was betrothed to Lucy. While Edgardo was absent in France, Lucia (Lucy) is made to believe that he is unfaithful to her, and in her temper she consents to marry the laird of Bucklaw, but on the wedding night she stabs him, goes mad, and dies—Donizetti, Lucia di Lammermoor (an opera, 1835), sir W. Scott, The Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.)

Lucia'na, sister of Adrian'a. She marries Antipholus of Syracuse—Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors (1593)

Lu'cida, the lady-love of sir Ferramont—Spenser, Faery Queen, II. 5 (1596)

Lucifer is described by Danté as a huge giant, with three faces: one red, indicative of anger, one yellow, indicative of envy, and one black, indicative of melancholy. Between his shoulders, the poet says, there shot forth two enormous wings, without plumage, "in texture like a bat's." With these "he flapped 'r' the air," and "Cocytus to its depth was frozen." "At six eyes he wept," and at every mouth he chimped a sinner—Danté, Hell, XXXIV (1301)

Lucif'era (Pride), daughter of Pluto and Proserpina. Her usher was Vanity. Her chariot was drawn by six different beasts, on each of which was seated one of the queen's counsellors. The foremost beast was an ass, ridden by Idleness who resembled a monk, paired with the ass was a swine, on which rode Gluttony clad in vine leaves. Next came a goat, ridden by Lechery arrayed in green, paired with the goat was a camel, on which rode Avarice in threadbare coat and cobbled shoes. The next beast was a wolf, bestrid by Envy arrayed in a kirtle full of eyes, and paired with the wolf was a lion, bestrid by Wrath in a robe all blood-stained. The coachman of the team was Satan.

Lo! underneath her cornful feet was lain

A dreadful dragon with a hideous train

And in her hand she held a mirror bright

Wherein her face she often viewed again.

Spenser Faery Queen, I. 4 (1590)

Lucinda, the daughter of opulent parents, engaged in marriage to Cardenio, a young gentleman of similar rank and equal opulence. Lucinda was, however, promised by her father in marriage to don Fernando, youngest son of the duke Ricardo. When the wedding day arrived, the young lady fell into a swoon, and a letter informed don Fernando that the bride was married already to Cardenio. Next day, she left the house privately, and took refuge in a convent, whence she was forcibly abducted by don Fernando. Stopping at an inn, the party found there Dorothea the wife of don Fernando, and Cardenio the husband of Lucinda, and all things arranged themselves satisfactorily to the parties concerned — Cervantes, Don Quixote, I iv (1605)

Lucin'da, the bosom friend of Rosetta, merry, coquettish, and fit for any fun. She is the daughter of justice Woodcock, and falls in love with Jack Eustace, against her father's desire. Jack, who is unknown to the justice, introduces himself into the house as a music-master, and sir William Meadows induces the old man to consent to the marriage of the young people — I Bickerstaff, Love in a Village

Lucinda, referred to by the poet Thomson in his Spring, was Lucy Forteseue, daughter of Hugh Forteseue of Devonshire, and wife of lord George Lyttelton

O Lyttelton

Courting the Muse thro Hagley Park thou strayst

Perhaps thy loved Lucinda shares thy walk,

With soul to thine attuned.

Thomson, The Seasons (Spring "1723).

Lucinde (2 syl), daughter of Sganarelle. As she has lost her spirit and appetite, her father sends for four physicians, who all differ as to the nature of the malady and the remedy to be applied. Lisette (her waiting-woman) sends in the mean time for Clitandre, the lover of Lucinde, who comes under the guise of a mock doctor. He tells Sganarelle the disease of the young lady must be reached through the imagination, and prescribes the semblance of a marriage. As his assistant is in reality a notary, the mock marriage turns out to be a real one — Molière, L'Amour Médecin (1665)

Lucinde (2 syl), daughter of Géronte (2 syl). Her father wanted her to marry Horace, but as she was in love with Léandre, she pretended to have lost the power of articulate speech, to avoid a marriage which she abhorred. Sganarelle, the faggot-maker, was introduced as a famous dumb doctor, and soon saw the state of affairs, so he took with him Léandre as an apothecary, and the young lady received a perfect cure from "pills matrimoniales" — Molière, Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666)

Lu'cio, a fantastic, not absolutely bad, but vicious and dissolute. He is unstable, "like a wave of the sea, driven by the wind and tossed," and has no restraining principle — Shakespeare, Measure for Measure (1603)

Lucip'pe (3 syl), a woman attached to the suite of the princess Calis (sister of Astorax king of Paphos) — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Mad Lover (1618)

Lu'cius, son of Coillus, a mythical king of Britain. Geoffrey says he sent a letter to pope Eleutherius (177-193) desiring to be instructed in the Christian religion, whereupon the pope sent over Dr Faganus and Dr Duvanns for the purpose. Lucius was baptized, and "people from all countries" with him. The pagan temples in Britain were converted into churches, the archflamens into archbishops, and the flamens into bishops. So there were twenty-eight bishops and three archbishops — British History, iv 19 (1470)

He our flamens' seats who turned to bishops sees,
Great Lucius, that good king to whom we chiefly owe
This happiness we have—Christ crucified to know
Dryden Polyolbion, viii (1619)

Nennius says that king Lucius was baptized in 167 by Evaristus, but this is a blunder, as Evaristus lived a century before the date mentioned.

The archflamens were those of London, York, and Newport (the City of Legions or Caerleon-on-Usk).

Drayton calls the two legates "Fugatus and St Damian"

Those goodly Romans who Wan good king Lucius first to embrace the Christian faith
Fugatus and his friend St. Damian have their remembrance here.
Dryden Polyolbion, xiv (1620)

After baptism, St Lucius abdicated, and became a missionary in Switzerland, where he died a martyr's death.

Lucius (Caius), general of the Roman forces in Britain in the reign of king Cymbeline (3 syl) — Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605)

Lucius Tiberius, general of the Roman army, who wrote to king Arthur, commanding him to appear at Rome to make satisfaction for the conquests he had made, and to receive such punishment as the senate might think proper to pass on him. This letter induced Arthur to declare war with Rome. So, committing the care of government to his nephew Modred, he marched to Lyonaise (in Gaul), where he won a complete victory, and left Lucius dead on the field.

He now started for Rome, but being told that Modred had usurped the crown, he hastened back to Britain, and fought the great battle of the West, where he received his death-wound from the hand of Modred — Geoffrey, British History, ix 15-20, x (1142)

Great Arthur did advance
To meet, with his allies, that puissant force in France
By Lucius thither led.

Drayton Polyolbon, iv (1612).

Lucretia, daughter of Spurius Lucretius prefect of Rome, and wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. She was dishonoured by Sextus, the son of Tarquinius Superbus. Having avowed her dishonour in the presence of her father, her husband, Junius Brutus, and some others, she stabbed herself.

This subject has been dramatized in French by Ant. Vincent Arnault, in a tragedy called Lucrece (1792), and by François Ponsard in 1843. In English, by Thomas Heywood, in a tragedy entitled The Rape of Lucrece (1630), by Nathaniel Lee, entitled Lucius Junius Brutus (seventeenth century), and by John H. Payne, entitled Brutus or The Fall of Tarquin (1820). Shakespeare selected the same subject for his poem entitled The Rape of Lucrece (1594).

Lucrezia di Borgia, daughter of pope Alexander VI. She was thrice married, her last husband being Alfonso duke of Ferrara. Before this marriage, she had a natural son named Gennaro, who was brought up by a Neapolitan fisherman. When grown to manhood, Gennaro had a commission given him in the army, and in the battle of Rimini he saved the life of Orsini. In Venice he declaimed freely against the vices of Lucrezia di Borgia, and on one occasion he mutilated the escutcheon of the duke by knocking off the B, thus converting Borgia into Orgia. Lucrezia insisted that the perpetrator of this insult should suffer death by poison, but when she discovered that the offender was her own son, she gave him an antidote, and released him from jail. Scarcely, however, was he liberated, than he was poisoned at a banquet given by the princess Negroni. Lucrezia now told Gennaro that he was her own son, and died as her son expired — Donizetti, Lucrezia di Borgia (an opera, 1834).

 Victor Hugo has a drama entitled Lucrece Borgia.

Lucullus, a wealthy Roman, noted for his banquets and self-indulgence. On one occasion, when a superb supper had been prepared, being asked who were to be his guests, he replied, "Lucullus will sup to-night with Lucullus" (B.C. 110-57).

He er Falerian threw a richer

Light upon Lucullus' tables.

Longfellow Drinking Song

Luc'umo, a satrap, chieftain, or khedive among the ancient Etruscans. The over-king was called Lars. Servius the grammarian says "Lūcūmo rex erat lingua Etruscā," but it was such a king as that of Bavaria in the empire of Germany, where the king of Prussia is the lars.

And plainly and more plainly

Now might the burghers know

By port and vest, by horse and crest,

Each warlike lucumo.

Lord Macaulay Lays of Ancient Rome

(Horatius "xiii. 1642")

Lucy, a dowdless girl betrothed to Amidas. Being forsaken by him for the wealthy Philtra, she threw herself into the sea, but was saved by clinging to a chest. Both being drifted ashore, it was found that the chest contained great treasures, which Lucy gave to Bracidas, the brother of Amidas, who married her. In this marriage, Bracidas found "two goodly portions, and the better she" — Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 4 (1596).

Lucy, daughter of Mr. Richard Wealthy, a rich London merchant. Her father wanted her to marry a wealthy tradesman, and as she refused to do so, he turned her out of doors. Being introduced as a filles de joie to sir George Wealthy "the minor," he soon perceived her to be a modest girl who had been entrapped, and he proposed marriage. When the facts of the case were known, Mr. Wealthy and the sir William (the father of the young man) were delighted at the happy termination of what might have proved a most untoward affair — S. Foote, The Minor (1760).

Lucy [GOODWILL], a girl of 16, and a child of nature, reared by her father who was a widower. "She has seen nothing," he says, "she knows nothing, and, therefore, has no will of her own." Old Goodwill wished her to marry one of her relations, that his money might be kept in the family, but Lucy had "will" enough of her own to see that her relations were boobies, and selected for her husband a big, burly footman named Thomas — Fielding, The Virgin Unmasked.

Lucy [LOCKIT], daughter of Lockit the jailer A foolish young woman, who, decoyed by captain Maheath under the specious promise of marriage, effected his escape from jail. The captain, however, was recaptured, and condemned to death, but being reprieved, confessed himself married to Polly Peachum, and Lucy was left to seek another mate.

How happy could I be with either [Lucy or Polly]

Were I other dear charmer away!

J. Gay The Beggar's Opera, II. 2 (1727)

Miss Fenton (duchess of Bolton) was the original "Lucy Lockit" (1708-1760)

Lucy and Colin. Colin was betrothed to Lucy, but forsook her for a bride "thrice as rich as she." Lucy drooped, but was present at the wedding, and when Colin saw her, "the damps of death bedewed his brow, and he died." Both were buried in one tomb, and many a hind and plighted maid resorted thither, "to deck it with garlands and true-love knots"—T. Tickell, Lucy and Colin.

* * Vincent Bourne has translated this ballad into Latin verse.

Through all Tickell's works there is a strain of ballad.

Lucylius (B.C. 148-103), the father of Roman satire.

I have presumed my lord for to present

Lud, son of Heh, who succeeded his father as king of Britain. "Lud rebuilt the walls of Trinovantum, and surrounded the city with innumerable towers for which reason it was called Kaer-lud, Anglicized into Lud-ton, and softened into London. When dead, his body was buried by the gate. Parth-lud, called in Saxon Ludes-gate"—Geoffrey, British History, III. 20 (1142).

Lud (General), the leader of distressed and riotous artisans in the manufacturing districts of England, who, in 1811, endeavoured to prevent the use of power-looms.

Luddites (2 syl), the riotous artisans who followed the leader called general Lud.

Lud's Town, London, as if a corruption of Lud-ton. Similarly, Ludgate is said to be Lud's-gate, and Ludgate prison is called "Lud's Bulwark." Of course, the etymologies are only suitable for fable.

King Lud repairing the city called it after his name, "Lud's town," the strong gate which he built in the west part he named "Lud gate." In 1200 the gate was beautified with images of Lud and other kings. Those images, in the reign of Edward VI. had their heads smitten off. Queen Mary did set new heads upon their old bodies again. The 28th of queen Elizabeth, the gate was newly beautified with images of Lud and others, as before—Stow, Survey of London (1593).

Ludovico, chief minister of Naples. He had a conspiracy to murder the king and seize the crown. Ludovico is the craftiest of villains, but, being caught in his own guile, he is killed—Shenl, Liadine or The Statue (1820).

Ludwal or Idwal, son of Roderick the Great, of North Wales. He refused to pay Edgar king of England the tribute which had been levied ever since the time of Ethelstan. William of Malmesbury tells us that Edgar commuted the tribute for 300 wolves' heads yearly, the wolf-tribute was paid for three years, and then discontinued, because there were no more wolves to be found.

O Edgar! who compelledst our Ludwal hence to pay

Three hundred wolves a year for tribute unto thee

Luggnagg, an island where the inhabitants never die. Swift shows some of the evils which would result from such a destiny, unless accompanied with eternal youth and freshness—Swift, Gulliver's Travels (1726).

Lu'gier, the rough, confident tutor of Oriana, etc., and chief engine whereby "the wild goose" Mirabel is entrapped into marriage with her—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Wild-geese Chase (1652).

Luke, brother-in-law of "the City madam." He was raised from a state of indigence into enormous wealth by a deed of gift of the estates of his brother, sir John Frugal, a retired merchant. While dependent on his brother, lady Frugal ("the City lady") treated Luke with great scorn and rudeness, but when she and her daughter became dependent on him, he cut down the superfluities of the fine lady to the measure of her original state—as daughter of Goodman Humble, farmer—Massinger, The City Madam (1639)

Luke (Sir) or SIR LUKE LIMP, a tuft-hunter, a devotee to the bottle, and a hanger-on of great men for no other reason than mere snobbism Sir Luke will "cling to sir John till the baronet is superseded by my lord, quitting the puny peer for an earl, and sacrificing all three to a duke"—S Foote, The Lame Lover

Luke's Bud (St), the ox

Luke's Iron Crown George and Luke Dosa headed an unsuccessful revolt against the Hungarian nobles in the sixteenth century Luke was put to death by a red-hot iron crown, in mockery of his having been proclaimed king

This was not an unusual punishment for those who sought regal honours in the Middle Ages Thus, when Tancred usurped the crown of Sicily, kaiser Heinrich VI of Germany set him on a red-hot iron throne, and crowned him with a red-hot iron crown (twelfth century)

* * The "iron crown of Lombardy" must not be mistaken for an iron crown of punishment The former is one of the nails used in the Crucifixion, beaten out into a thin rim of iron, magnificently set in gold, and adorned with jewels Charlemagne and Napoleon I were both crowned with it

Lumbercourt (Lord), a voluptuary, greatly in debt, who consented, for a good money consideration, to give his daughter to Egerton McSycophant Egerton, however, had no fancy for the lady, but married Constantia, the girl of his choice His lordship was in alarm lest this contretemps should be his ruin, but sir Pertinax told him the bargain should still remain good if Egerton's younger brother, Sandy, were accepted by his lordship instead To this his lordship readily agreed

Lady Rodolpha Lumbercourt, daughter of lord Lumbereourt, who, for a consideration, consented to marry Egerton McSycophant, but as Egerton had no fancy for the lady, she agreed to marry Egerton's brother Sandy on the same terms

As I have reason to have the least affection till my cousin Egerton and as my intended marriage with him was entirely an act of obedience till my grandmother provided my cousin Sandy will be as agreeable till her ladyship as my cousin Charles here would have been I have none the least objection till the change Ay ay one brother is as good to Rodolpha as another —C Macklin, The Man of the World v (1764)

Lumbey (Dr), a stout, bluff-looking gentleman, with no shirt-collar, and a beard that had been growing since yesterday morning, for the doctor was very popular, and the neighbourhood prolific —C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Lu'ria, a noble Moor, single-minded, warm-hearted, faithful, and most generous, employed by the Florentines to lead their army against the Pisans (14th century) Luria was entirely successful, but the Florentines, to lessen their obligation to the conqueror, hunted up every item of scandal they could find against him, and, while he was winning their battles, he was informed that he was to be brought to trial to answer these floating censures. Luria was so disgusted at this, that he took poison, to relieve the state by his death of a debt of gratitude which the republic felt too heavy to be borne — Robert Browning, Luria

Lu'siad, the adventures of the Lusians (Portuguese), under Vasquez da Gama, in their discovery of India. Bæchus was the guardian power of the Mohammedans, and Venus or Divine Love of the Lusians. The fleet first sailed to Mozambique, then to Quiloa, then to Melinda (in Africa), where the adventurers were hospitably received and provided with a pilot to conduct them to India. In the Indian Ocean, Bæchus tried to destroy the fleet, but the "silver star of Divine Love" calmed the sea, and Gama arrived at India in safety. Having reconquered his object, he returned to Lisbon — Camoens, The Lusiad, in ten books (1572)

* * Vasquez da Gama sailed thence to India (1) In 1497, with four vessels. This expedition lasted two years and two months (2) In 1502, with twenty ships. In this expedition he was attacked by Zamorin king of Calicut, whom he defeated, and returned to Lisbon the year following (3) When John III appointed him viceroy of India. He established his government at Cochim, where he died in 1525. The story of The Lusiad is the first of these expeditions

Lusignan [D'OUTREMER], king of Jerusalem, taken captive by the Saracens, and confined in a dungeon for twenty years. When 80 years old, he was set free by Osman the sultan of the East, but died within a few days — A Hill, Zara (adapted from Voltaire's tragedy)

Lusitania, the ancient name of Portugal, so called from Lus, the companion of Bæchus in his travels. This Lus colonized the country, and called it "Lusitania," and the colonists "Lusians" — Pliny, Historia Naturalis, in 1

Lydia, daughter of the king of Lydia, was sought in marriage by Alcestis a Threian knight. His suit being rejected, he repaired to the king of Armenia, who gave him an army, with which he besieged Lydia. He was persuaded to raise the siege, and the lady tested the sincerity of his love by a series of tasks, all of which he accomplished. Lastly, she set him to put to death his allies, and, being powerless, mocked him. Alcestis pined and died, and Lydia was doomed to endless torment in hell—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso, XIII (1516)

Lydia, lady's-maid to Widow Green. She was the sister of Truworth, ran away from home to avoid a hateful marriage, took service for the nonce, and ultimately married Waller. She was "a miracle of virtue, as well as beauty," warm-hearted, and wholly without artifice—S Knowles, The Love-Chase (1837)

Lydia Languish, niece and ward of Mrs Malaprop. She had a fortune of £50,000, but, if she married without her aunt's consent, forfeited the larger part thereof. She was a great novel reader, and was courted by two rival lovers—Bob Acres, and captain Absolute whom she knew only as ensign Beverley. Her aunt insisted that she should throw over the ensign and marry the son of sir Anthony Absolute, and great was her joy to find that the man of her own choice was that of her aunt's nomine mutato Bob Acres resigned all claim on the lady to his rival — Sheridan, The Rivals (1776)

Lying Valet (The), Timothy Sharp, the lying valet of Charles Gayless. He is the Mercury between his master and Melissa, to whom Gayless is about to be married. The object of his lying is to make his master, who has not a sixpence in the world, pass for a man of fortune — D Garrick, The Lying Valet (1741)

Lyle (Annot), daughter of sir Duncan Campbell the knight of Ardenvoehr. She was brought up by the M'Aulays, and was beloved by Allan M'Aulay, but she married the earl of Menteith — Sir W Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I)

Lyn'ceus, one of the Argonauts, so sharp-sighted that he could discern objects at a distance of 180 miles. Varro says he could "see through rocks and trees," and Pliny, that he could see "the infernal regions through the earth."

Strange tale to tell all officers be blynde
And yet their one eye sharpe as Lyn ceus sight.
G Gascoigne, The Steele Glas (died 1577)

Lynch (Governor) was a great name in Galway (Ireland). It is said that he hanged his only son out of the window of his own house (1526). The very window from which the boy was hung is carefully preserved, and still pointed out to travellers — Annals of Galway

Lynch Law, law administered by a self-constituted judge. Webster says James Lynch, a farmer of Piedmont, in Virginia, was selected by his neighbours (in 1688) to try offences on the frontier summarily, because there were no law courts within seven miles of them.

Lynchno'bians, lantern-sellers, that is, booksellers and publishers. Rabelais says they inhabit a little hamlet near

Lantern-land — Rabelais, Pantagruel, v 33 (1546)

Lyndon (Barry), an Irish sharper, whose adventures are told by Thackeray. The story is full of spirit, variety, and humour, reminding one of Gil Blas. It first came out in Fraser's Magazine.

Lynette, sister of lady Lyonors of Castle Perilous. She goes to king Arthur, and prays him to send sir Lancelot to deliver her sister from certain knights. The king assigns the quest to Beaumains (the nickname given by sir Kay to Gareth), who had served for twelve months in Arthur's kitchen. Lynette is exceedingly indignant, and treats her champion with the utmost contumely, but, after each victory, softens towards him, and at length marries him — Tennyson, Idylls of the King ("Gareth and Lynette")

* * This version of the tale differs from that of the History of Prince Arthur (sir T Malory, 1470) in many respects (See LIVER, p 556)

Lyonnesse (3 syl), west of Camelot. The battle of Lyonnesse was the "last great battle of the West," and the scene of the final conflict between Arthur and sir Modred. The land of Lyonnesse is where Arthur came from, and it is now submerged full "forty fathoms under water."

Until king Arthur's table [knights] man by man,
Had fallen in Lyonnesse about their lord.
Tennyson Morte d'Arthur

Lyonors, daughter of earl Sanam. She came to pay homage to king Arthur, and by him became the mother of sir Borre (1 syl), one of the knights of the Round Table — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 15 (1470)

* * Lions, daughter of sir Persaunt, and sister of Linct of Castle Perilous, married sir Gareth. Tennyson calls this lady "Lyonors," and makes Gareth marry her sister, who, we are told in the History, was married to sir Gaheris (Gareth's brother)

Lyonors, the lady of Castle Perilous, where she was held captive by several knights called Morning Star or Phosphorus, Noonday Sun or Mercuries, Evening Star or Hesperus, and Night or Nox. Her sister Lynette went to King Arthur, to crave that sir Lancelot might be sent to deliver Lyonors from her oppressor. The king gave the quest to Gareth, who was knighted, and accompanied Lynette, who used him very scornfully at first, but at every victory which he gained she abated somewhat of her contempt, and married him after he had succeeded in delivering Lyons. The lot of Lyons is not told (See LIONS)—Tennyson, Idylls of the King ("Gareth and Lynette")

 According to the collection of tales edited by sir T Malory, the lady Lyons was quite another person. She was daughter of earl Sinam, and mother of sir Borre by King Arthur (pt 1 15). It was Lionés who was the sister of Linet, and whose father was sir Persaunt of Castle Perilous (pt 1 153). The History says that Lionés married Gareth, and Linet married his brother, sir Gaheris (See GARETH, p 364.)

Lyrists (Prince of), Franz Schubert (1797-1828)

Lysander, a young Athenian, in love with Hermia daughter of Egeus (3 syl). Egeus had promised her in marriage to Demetrius, and insisted that she should either marry him or suffer death "according to the Athenian law." In this dilemma, Hermia fled from Athens with Lysander. Demetrius went in pursuit, and was followed by Helena, who doted on him. All four fell asleep, and "dreamed a dream" about the fairies. When Demetrius awoke, he became more reasonable, for, seeing that Hermia disliked him and Helena loved him sincerely, he consented to forego the former and wed the latter. Egeus, being informed thereof, now readily agreed to give his daughter to Lysander, and all went merry as a marriage bell.—Shakespeare, A Midsummer Night's Dream (1592)

Maca'ber (The Dance) or the "Dance of Death" (Arabic, ma'abur, "a churchyard') The dance of death was a favourite subject in the Middle Ages for wall-paintings in cemeteries and churches, especially in Germany. Death is represented as presiding over a round of dancers, consisting of rich and poor, old and young, male and female. A work descriptive of this dance, originally in German, has been translated into most European languages, and the painting of Helheim, in the Dominican convent at Basel, has a world-wide reputation. Others are at Minden, Lucerne, Lubeck, Dresden, and the north side of old St Pauls.

Note. What are the paintings on the walls around the choir?—"The Dance of Death."—"The Dance of Death."

Macaire (Le Chevalier Pichard), a French knight, who, aided by lieutenant Landry, murdered Aubri de Montdidier in the forest of Bondy, in 1571. Montdidier's dog, named Dragon, showed such an aversion to Macaire, that suspicion was aroused, and the man and dog were pitted to a public combat. The result was fatal to the man, who died confessing his guilt. See Chanson de Gerle (twelfth century).

There are two French plays on the subject, one entitled Le Chien de Montargis, and the other Le Chien d'Alençon. The former of these has been adapted to the English stage. Dragon was called Chien de Montargis, because the assassination took place near this castle, and was depicted in the great hall over the crimmes-piece.

In the English drama, the rash of the murdered man is found in the possession of his sword in Macaire, and is recognized by Landry, who worked the sword-blade, and gave it to captain Aubri, who was her sweetheart. Macaire then confessed the crime. His accomplice, lieutenant Landry, trying to escape, was seized by the dog Dragon, and bitten to death.

Macaire (Robert), a cant name for a Frenchman.

MacAlpine (Jeune), landlady of the Chieftan of Aberfoyle.—Sir W. Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I.)

Macamut, a sultan of Cambray, who lived so much upon poison that his very breath and touch were fatal.—Purchas, Pilgrimage (1613).

MacAnJolister (Nathan), a follower of Rob Roy.—Sir W. Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I.)

Macare (2 syl.), the impersonation of good temper.—Voltaire, Telème and Macare (an allegory).

Macaulay (Angus), a Highland chief, in the army of the earl of Montrose.

Allan Macauley or "Allan of the Red Hand," brother of Angus. Allan is "a peer," and is in love with Annot Lyle. He slays the earl of Menteith on the eve of his marriage, out of jealousy, but the earl recovers and marries Annot Lyle.—Sir W. Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.).

Macbeth, son of Sinel thane of Glamis, and grandson of Malcolm II. by his second daughter, the elder daughter married Crinan, father of Duncan who succeeded his grandfather on the throne. Hence king Duncan and Macbeth were cousins. Duncan, staying as a guest with Macbeth at the castle of Inverness (1040), was murdered by his host, who then usurped the crown. The battle which Macbeth had just won was this.—Sven, king of Norway had landed with an army in Fife, for the purpose of invading Scotland, Macbeth and Banquo were set against him, and defeated him with such loss, that only ten men of all his army escaped alive. Macbeth was prompted by the witches (1) that none of woman born should kill him, and (2) that he should not die till Birnam Wood removed to Dunsinane. He was slain in battle by Macduff, who was "from his mother's womb untimely ripped," and as for the moving wood, the soldiers of Macduff, in their march to Dunsinane, were commanded to carry boughs of the forest before them, to conceal their numbers.

Lady Macbeth, wife of Macbeth, a woman of great ambition and inexorable will. When her husband told her that the witches prophesied he should be king, she induced him to murder Duncan, who was at the time their guest. She would herself have done it, but "he looked in sleep so like her father that she could not." However, when Macbeth had murdered the king, she felt no scruple in murdering the two grooms that slept with him, and throwing the guilt on them. After her husband was crowned, she was greatly troubled by dreams, and used to walk in her sleep, trying to rub from her hands imaginary stains of blood. She died, probably, by her own hand.—Shakespeare, Macbeth (1606).

Note.—Is a terrible impersonation of evil passions and mighty powers, never so far removed from our own nature.

as to be cast beyond the pale of our sympathy for she remains a woman to the last, and is always linked with her sex and with humanity —Mrs. Jameson.

"It is related of Mrs Betterton," says C Dibdin, "that though 'lady Macbeth' had been frequently well performed, no actress, not even Mrs Barry, could in the smallest degree be compared to her" Mrs Siddons calls Mrs Pritchard "the greatest of all the 'lady Macbeths,'" but Mrs Siddons herself was so great in this character, that in the sleep-walking scene, in her farewell performance, the whole audience stood on the benches, and demanded that the performance should end with that scene Since then, Helen Faucit has been the best "lady Macbeth," Mrs Betterton (died 1712), Mrs Barry (1682-1733), Mrs Pritchard (1711-1768), Mrs Siddons (1755-1831), Helen Faucit (born 1820)

MacFleck'noe, in Dryden's satire so called, is meant for Thomas Shadwell, who was promoted to the office of poet-lanreate. The design of Dryden's poem is to represent the inauguration of one dullard as successor of another in the monarchy of nonsense. R Flecknoe was an Irish priest and hackney poet of no reputation, and Mac in Celtic being son, "MacFlecknoe" means the son of the poetaster so named Flecknoe, seeking for a successor to his own dullness, selects Shadwell to bear his mantle.

Shadwell alone my perfect image bears
Mature in dullness from his tender years
The rest to some faint meaning make pretence
But Shadwell never declines into sense.

Dryden MacFlecknoe (a satire 1682)

An ordinary reader would scarcely suppose that Shadwell who is here meant by MacFlecknoe was worth being chastised, and that Dryden descending to such game was like an eagle stooping to catch flies. But the truth is that Shadwell at one time held divided reputation with this great poet. Every age produces its fashion able dunces, who supply talkative ignorance with materials for conversation.—Goldsmith, Beauties of English Poets (1767)

MacGrainer (Master), a dissenting minister at Kipplettingan—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Mrs M'Guffog, David's wife—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Macham (Robert), the discoverer of Madeira Island, to which he was driven while eloping with his lady-love (A D 1344). The lady soon died, and the mariners made off with the ship. Macham, after his mourning was over, made a rude boat out of a tree, and, with two or three men, putting forth to sea, landed on the shores of Africa. Tho Rev W L Bowles has made the marvellous adventures of Robert Macham the subject of a poem, and Drayton, in his Polyolbion, xix, has devoted twenty-two lines to the same subject.

Macheath (Captain), captain of a gang of highwaymen, a fine, bold-faced ruffian, "game" to the very last. He is married to Polly Peachum, but finds himself dreadfully embarrassed between Polly his wife, and Lucy to whom he has promised marriage. Being betrayed by eight women at a drinking bout, the captain is lodged in Newgate, but Lucy effects his escape. He is recaptured, tried, and condemned to death, but being reprieved, acknowledges Polly to be his wife, and promises to remain constant to her for the future—J. Gay, The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Men will not become highwaymen because Macheath is acquitted on the stage—Dr Johnson.

T Walker was the original "Macheath," but Charles Halet (1701-1786) was allowed to excel him. O'Keefe says West Digges (1720-1786) was the best "Macheath" he ever saw in person, song, and manners. Incedon (1764-1826) performed the part well, and in 1821 Miss Blake delighted play-goers by her pretty imitation of the highwayman.

Machiavelli (Niccolo dei), of Florence, author of a book called The Prince, the object of which is to show that all is fair in diplomacy, as well as in "love and war" (1469-1527).

Mac'lin (Sir), a priest who preached to Tom and Bob and Billy, on the sinfulness of walking on Sundays. At his "sixthly" he said, "Ho, ho, I see you raise your hands in agony!" They certainly had raised their hands, for they were yawning. At his "twenty-firstly" he cried, "Ho, ho, I see you bow your heads in heartfelt sorrow!" Truly they bowed their heads, for they were sleeping. Still on he preached and thumped his hat, when the bishop passing by, cried, "Bosh!" and walked him off—W S Gilbert, The Bab Ballads ("Sir Macklin")

Maclean (Sir Hector), a Highland chief in the army of Montrose—Sir W Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I)

Macleary (Widow), landlady of the Tully Veolan village ale-house—Sir W Scott, Waterley (time, George II)

MacSarcasm (Sir Archy), in Love a-la-mode, by C Macklin (1779). Boaden says "To Covent Garden, G F Cooke [1746-1812] was a great acquisition, as he was a 'Shylock,' an 'Iago,' a 'Kately,' a 'sir Archy,' and a 'sir Pertinax' [McSycophant]." Leigh Hunt says that G F Cooke was a new kind of Macklin, and, like him, excelled in "Shylock" and "sir Archy McSarcasm."

* * "Shylock" in the Merchant of Venice (Shakespeare), "Iago" in Othello (Shakespeare), "Kately" in Every Man in His Humour (B Jonson), "sir Archy" that is, "McSarcasm", "sir Pertinax McSycophant" in The Man of the World (Macklin)

MacSillergrip, a Scotch pawnbroker, in search of Robt Serawhey, his runaway apprentice, whom he pursues upstairs and assaults with blows.

Mrs MacSillergrip, the pawnbroker's wife, always in terror lest the manager should pay her indecorous attentions — Charles Mathews (At home, in Multiple)

The skill with which Mathews (17-133) carried on a conversation between these three persons produced a most astonishing effect. — Contemporary Layer

MacStanger (Mrs), a widow who kept lodgings at No 9, Brig Place, on the brink of a canal near the India Docks. Captain Cuttle lodged there. Mrs MacStinger was a termagant, and rendered the captain's life miserable. He was afraid of her, and, although her lodger, was her slave. When her son Alexander was refractory, Mrs MacStinger used to seat him on a cold paving-stone. She contrived to make captain Bunsby her second husband — C Dickens, Dombeys and Son (1846)

MacSycophant (Sir Pertinax), the hot-headed, ambitious father of Charles Egerton. His love for Scotland is very great, and he is continually quarrelling with his family because they do not hold his country in sufficient reverence.

I raised it [my fortune] by boozing. I never could stand straight in the presence of a great man but always boozed and boozed and boozed as it were by instinct. — Act III

Charles Egerton McSycophant, son of sir Pertinax Egerton was the mother's name. Charles Egerton marries Constantha — C Macklin, The Man of the World (1764)

Mactab (The Hon Miss Lucretia), sister of lord Lofty, and sister-in-law of lieutenant Worthington "the poor gentleman." Miss Lucretia was an old maid, "stiff as a ramrod." Being very poor, she allowed the lieutenant "the honour of maintaining her," for which "she handsomely gave him her countenance," but when the lieutenant was obliged to discontinue his hospitality, she resolved to "countenance a tobacconist of Glasgow, who was her sixteenth cousin." — G. Colman, The Poor Gentleman (1802)

MacTavish Mhor or Hamish M'Tavish, a Highland outlaw.

Elspat M'Tavish, or "The Woman of the tree," widow of M'Tavish Mhor, "the Highland widow." She prevents her son from joining his regiment, in consequence of which he is shot as a deserter, and Elspat goes mad.

Hamish Bean M'Tavish, son of Elspat M'Tavish. He joins a Highland regiment, and goes to visit his mother, who gives him a sleeping draught to detain him. As he does not join his regiment in time, he is arrested for desertion, tried, and shot at Dunbarton Castle — Sir W Scott, The Highland Widow (time, George II)

Phin. Fletcher The Purple Island vii. (1633)

Mæon'ides (4 syl.) Homer is so called, either because he was son of Mæon, or because he was a native of Mæon'ia (Lydia). He is also called Mæonius Sæxer, and his poems Mæonian Lays

When great Mæonides in rap'd song,
The thundering tide of battle rolls along
Each ravish'd bosom feels the high alarms,
And all the burning pulses beat to arms.
Falconer The Shipwreck, III. 1 (1785)

Mæviad, a satire by Gifford, on the Della Cruscan school of poetry (published 1796). The word is from Virgil's Ecloge

Qui Barium non edit, amet sua carmina, Mævi,
Atque idem jungat vulpes, et mæugat hircos
Virgil, Ecl. III. 90 & 91

Who hates not Barius, or on Mævius dotes,
Should plough with foxes or should milk his goats.

Mævius, any vile poet. (See BAVIUS)

But if fond Barius vent his clouted song
Or Mævius chant his thoughts in brothel charm,
The warts vulgar in a numerous throng
Like summer flies about the dunghill swarm
Who hates not one may hate the other love.
Phineas Fletcher The Purple Island I. (1633)

Magalo'na (The Fair), daughter of the king of Naples. She is the heroine of an old romance of chivalry, originally written in French, but translated into Spanish in the fifteenth century. Cervantes alludes to this romance in Don Quixote. The main incident of the story turns on a flying horse made by Merlin, which came into the possession of Peter of Provence.—The History of the Fair

Maggots of the Brains Swift says it was the opinion of certain virtuosi that the brain is filled with little maggots, and that thought is produced by their biting the nerves

To tickle the maggot born in an empty head.
Tennyson Maud II. v. 3

Maggy, the half-witted granddaughter of Little Dorrit's nurse. She had a fever at the age of ten, from ill-treatment, and her mind and intellect never went beyond that period. Thus, if asked her age, she always replied, "Ten," and she always repeated the last two or three words of what was said to her. She called Amy Dorrit "Little Mother."

She was about eight and twenty with large bones, large features, large feet and hands, large eyes and no hair. Her large eyes were lumpy and almost colourless; they seemed to be very little affected by light and to stand unchangeably still. There was also that attentive listening expression in her face which is seen in the faces of the blind, but she was not blind, having one tolerably serviceable eye. Her face was not exceedingly ugly, being redeemed by a smile. A great white cap, with a quantity of opaque frilling, apologized for Maggy's baldness, and made it so difficult for her old black bonnet to retain its place upon her head, that it held on round her neck like a gipsy's baby. The rest of her dress resembled tea weed with here and there a gigantic tea leaf. Her shawl looked like a huge tea leaf after long infusion.—C. Dickens, Little Dorrit, I. (1837)

Magi or Three Kings of Cologne, the "wise men from the East," who followed the guiding-star to the manger in Bethlehem with offerings. Melchior king of Nubia, the shortest of the three, offered gold, indicative of royalty; Balthazar king of Chaldea offered frankincense, indicative of divinity; and Gaspar king of Tarshish, a black Ethiop, the tallest of the three, offered myrrh, symbol of death.

Melchior means "King of light," Balthazar, "lord of treasures," and Gaspar or Caspar, "the white one."

* * Klopstock, in his Messiah, makes the Magi six in number, and gives the names as Hadad, Selmi, Zimri, Mirja, Beled, and Sunith.—Bk. v. (1771)

Magic Garters. No horse can keep up with a man furnished with these garters. They are made thus: Strips of the skin of a young hare are cut two inches wide and some motherwort, gathered in the first degree of the sign Capricorn and partially dried, is sewn into these strips, which are then folded in two. The garters are to be worn as other garters — Les Secrets Merveilleux du Petit Albert, 128

Were it not for my magic garters,
I should not continue the business long
Longfellow The Golden Legend (1851).

Magic Rings, like that of Gyges king of Lydia. Plato in his Republic, and Cicero in his Offices, say the ring was found in the flanks of a horse of brass. Those who wore it became invisible. By means of this ring, Gyges entered the chamber of Candaules, and murdered him.

Magic Staff (The) This staff would guarantee the bearer from all the perils and mishaps incidental to travellers. No robber nor wild beast, no mad dog, venomous animal, nor accident, could hurt its possessor. The staff consisted of a willow branch, gathered on the eve of All Saints' Day, the pith being removed, two eyes of a young wolf, the tongue and heart of a dog, three green lizards, the hearts of three swallows, seven leaves of vervain gathered on the eve of John the Baptist's Day, and a stone taken from a lapwing's nest, were inserted in the place of the pith. The toe of the staff was furnished with an iron ferrule, and the handle was of box, or any other material, according to fancy — Les Secrets Merveilleux du Petit Albert, 180

Were it not for my magic staff
I should not continue the business long
Longfellow The Golden Legend (1851)

Magic Wands The hermit gave Charles the Dane and Ubaldo a wand, which, being shaken, infused terror into all who saw it — Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

The palmer who accompanied sir Guyon had a wand of like virtue. It was made of the same wood as Mercury's caduceus — Spenser, Faery Queen, II (1590)

Magician of the North (The), sir Walter Scott (1771-1832)

How beautifully has the Magician of the North described The Field of Waterloo — Lord W. P. Lennox, Celebrities etc. I. 16.

* * Johann Georg Hamann of Prussia called himself "The Magician of the North" (1780-1788)

Magliabechi, the greatest book-worm that ever lived. He devoured books, and never forgot anything he had read. He had also so exact a memory, that he could tell the precise place and shelf of a book, as well as the volume and page of any passage required. He was the librarian of the great- duke Cosimo III. His usual dinner was three hard-boiled eggs and a draught of water (1633-1714)

Magmu, the coquette of Astracan

Though naturally handsome she used every art to set off her beauty. Not a word proceeded from her mouth that was not studied. To counterfeited a violent passion to sigh & propos to make an attractive gesture, to trifle agreeably and collect the various graces of dumb eloquence into a smile were the arts in which she excelled. She spent hours before her glass in deciding how a curl might be made to hang loosely upon her neck to the greatest advantage, how to open and shut her lips so as best to show her teeth without affectation — to turn her face full or otherwise, as occasion might require. She looked on herself with ceaseless admiration and always admired most the works of her own hand in improving on the beauty which nature had bestowed on her — T. B. Guelette Chinese Tales (Magmu "1723")

Magnanimous (The), Alfonso V of Aragon (1385, 1416-1458)

Khosru or Chosroës, the twenty-first of the Sassanidæ, was surnamed Noushriwan ("Magnanimous") (*, 531-579)

Magnano, one of the leaders of the rabble that attacked Hudibras at a bear-baiting. The character is designed for Simeon Wait, a tinker, as famous an independent preacher as Burroughs. He used to style Cromwell "the archangel who did battle with the devil" — S. Butler, Hudibras, I. 2 (1663)

Magnetic Mountain (The) This mountain drew out all the nails and iron bolts of any ship which approached it, thus causing it to fall to pieces.

This mountain is very steep and on the summit is a large dome made of fine bronze which is supported upon columns of the same metal. On the top of the dome there is a bronze horse with the figure of a man upon it.

There is a tradition that this statue is the principal cause of the loss of so many vessels and men and that it will never cease from being destructive till it be overthrown — Arabian Nights (The Third Calender ")

Magnificent (The), Khosru or Chosroës I of Persia (*, 531-579)

Soliman I, greatest of the Turkish sultans (1493, 1520-1566)

Magog, according to Ezech xxxviii, xxxix, was a country or people over whom Gog was prince. Some say the Goths are meant, others the Persians, others the Seythians or the northern nations of Europe generally.

Sale says that Magog is the tribe called by Ptolemy "Gilan," and by Strabo "Geli" or "Gela" — Al Korân, xxviii note (See Gog)

Magog, one of the princes of Satan, whose ambition is to destroy hell

Magounce (2 yf), Arandel Castle.

He drew southward into the sea till, by fortune, he came to a castle called Magounce, and now is called Arandel, in Sea Voy.—El T. Malory: History of Prince Arthur in 115 (1470)

Magrino, the champion of Isabella of Portugal who refused to pay tribute to France. He vanquished the French champion, and thus liberated his country from tribute

Magwitch (Abel), a convict for life, the unknown father of Estella, who was adopted from infancy by Miss Havisham, the daughter of a rich banker. The convict, having made his escape to Australia, became a successful sheep farmer, and sent money secretly to Mr Jaggers a London lawyer, to educate Pip as a gentleman. When Pip was 23 years old, Magwitch returned to England, under the assumed name of Provis, and made himself known to Pip. He was tricked by Orlick and Compeyson, arrested, condemned to death, and died in jail. All his money was confiscated.—C. Dickens, Great Expectations (1860)

Mahmut, the "Turkish Spy" who remained undiscovered in Paris for forty-five years, revealing to his Government all the intrigues of the Christian courts (1637-1632)

(9) Umm Habiba (mother of Habiba) widow of Abu Sofian.

(10) "Almama, who was 51 when he married her and a widow. She survived all his ten wives.

* It will be observed that most of Mahomet's wives were widows.

Mahomet Voltaire wrote a drama so entitled in 1738, and James Miller, in 1740, produced an English version of the same, called Mahomet the Impostor. The scheme of the play is thus: Mahomet is lying siege to Mecca, and has in his camp Zaphna and Palmira, taken captives in childhood and brought up by him. They are really the children of Alnorr the chief of Mecca, but I now it now, and love each other. Mahomet is in love with Palmira, and sets Zaphna to murder

Alcanor, pretending that it is God's will Zaphna obeys the behest, is told that Alcanor is his father, and is poisoned Mahomet asks Palmira in marriage, and she stabs herself

J Bannister (1760-1836) began his stage career in tragedy and played Mahomet. Garrick asked him what character he wished to play next. Why said Bannister "Oroonoko" "Eh oh!" said David staring at Bannister who was very thin. Eh eh! you will look as much like Oroonoko as a chimney sweeper in consumption —T Campbell.

Mahomet's Coffin is said to be suspended in mid-air The wise ones affirm that the coffin is of iron, and is suspended by the means of loadstones The faithful assert it is held up by four angels Burekhardt says it is not suspended at all A marabout told Labat

Que le tombeau de Mahomet étoit porté en l'air par le moyen de certains Anges qui se relayent d'heure en heures pour soutenir ce fardeau —Labat, Afrique Occidentale ii 143 (1723)

The balance always would hang even Like Mahomet's tomb twist earth and heaven
Prior Alma ii 193 (1717)

Mahomet's Dove, a dove which Mahomet taught to pick seed placed in his ear The bird would perch on the prophet's shoulder and thrust its bill into his ear to find its food, but Mahomet gave out that it was the Holy Ghost, in the form of a dove, sent to impart to him the counsels of God —Dr Prideaux, Life of Mahomet (1697), Sir W Raleigh, History of the World, i 16 (1614)

Instance proud Mahomet
The sacred dove whispering into his ear
That what his will imposed the world must fear
Lord Brooke Declination of Monarchie etc (1634-1628)
Was Mahomet inspired with a dove?
Thou with an eagle art inspired [Joan of Arc]
Shakespeare 1 Henry VI act I sc. 3 (1599)

Mahomet's Knowledge of Events Mahomet in his coffin is informed by an angel of every event which occurs respecting the faithful

Il est vivant dans son tombeau Il fait la prière dans ce tombeau à chaque fois que le crieur en fait la proclamation et au même tems qu'on le recite. Il y a un ange posté sur son tombeau qui a soin de lui donner avis des prières que les fidèles font pour lui. —Gagner Vie de Mahomet vii. 18 (1723)

Mahomet of the North, Odin, both legislator and supreme deity

Mahoud, son of a rich jeweller of Delhi, who ran through a large fortune in riotous living, and then bound himself in service to Bennaskar, who proved to be a magician Mahoud impeached Bennaskar to the cadi, who sent officers to seize him, but, lo! Mahoud had been metamorphosed into the likeness of Bennaskar, and was condemned to be burnt alive When the pile was set on fire, he became a toad, and in this form met the sultan Misnar, his vizier Horani, and the princess Hemyn'nah of Cassimur, who had been changed into toads also —Sir C Morell [J Ridley], Tales of the Genn ("The Enchanter's Tale," vi, 1751)

Mahound or Mahoun, a name of contempt for Mahomet or any pagan god Hence Ariosto makes Ferrau "blaspheme his Mahoun and Termagant" (Orlando Furioso, xii 59)

Fitter for a turban for Mahound or Termagant, than a head gear of a reasonable creature. —Sir W Scott.

Mahu, the fiend-prince that urges to theft

Five fiends have been in poor Tom at once of lust, as Obdurate Hobdildance prince of dumbness Mahu of stealing Modo of murder and Filthbertigabbet of mop and mowing —Shakespeare King Lear act IV sc 1 (1605)

Maid Ma'rian, a name assumed by Matilda, daughter of Robert lord Fitzwalter, while Robin Hood remained in a state of outlawry She was poisoned with a poached egg at Dunmow Priory, by a messenger of king John sent for the purpose This was because Marian was loved by the king, but rejected him Drayton has written her legend

So ere she came the game.
Her clothes tucked to the knee and dainty braided hair
With bow and quiver armed she wandered here and there
Amongst the forest wild Diana never knew
Such pleasures, nor such barts as Ma'rian's slew
Polyolbion xxvi (1622)

Maid Marian, introduced into the May-day morris-dance, was a boy dressed in girl's clothes She was queen of the May, and used to wear a tinsel crown, and carry in her left hand a flower Her coat was purple, her surcoat blue, her cuffs white, the skirts of her robe yellow, the sleeves carnation, and the stomacher red with yellow cross bars (See MORRIS-DANCE)

Maid of Athens, There's a Maeri, rendered famous by Byron's song, "Maid of Athens, fare thee well!" Twenty-four years after this song was written, an Englishman sought out "the Athenian maid," and found a beggar without a single vestige of beauty She was married and had a large family, but the struggle of her life was to find bread to keep herself and family from positive starvation

Maid of Bath (The), Miss Linley, who married R B Sheridan Swinell Foote wrote a farce entitled The Maid of Bath, in which he gibbets Mr Walter Long under the name of "Lint."

Maid of Honour (The), by P. Massinger (1637). Camiola, a very wealthy, high-minded lady, was in love with prince Bertoldo brother of Roberto king of the Two Sicilies, but Bertoldo, being a knight of Malta, could not marry without a dispensation from the pope. While matters were in this state, Bertoldo led an army against Aurelia duchess of Sienna and was taken prisoner. Camiola paid his ransom, and Aurelia commanded the prisoner to be brought before her. Bertoldo came, the duchess fell in love with him and offered marriage, and Bertoldo, forgetful of Camiola, accepted the offer. The betrothed then presented themselves to the king when Camiola expressed the conduct of Bertoldo. The king was indignant at the baseness, Aurelia rejected Bertoldo with scorn, and Camiola took the veil.

Maid of Marendorpt (The), a drama by S. Knowles based on Miss Porter's novel of The Village of Marendorpt (1803). The "maid" is Meeta, daughter of Mahldenaun minister of Marendorpt, and betrothed to major Rupert Roselheim. The plot is thus: Mahldenaun starts for Prague in search of Meeta's sister, who fell into some soldiers' hands in infancy during the siege of Magdeburg. On entering Prague, he is seized as a spy, and condemned to death. Meeta, hearing of his capture, walks to Prague to plead for his life, and finds that the governor's "daughter" is her lost sister. Rupert storms the prison and releases Mahldenaun.

Maid of Norway, Margaret, daughter of Eric II and Margaret of Norway. She was betrothed to Edward, son of Edward I of England, but died on her passage (1290).

Maid of Orleans, Jeanne d'Arc, famous for having raised the siege of Orleans, held by the English. The general tradition is that she was burnt alive as a witch, but this is doubted (1412-1431).

Maid of Perth (Fair), Catharine Glover, daughter of Simon Glover, the old Glover of Perth. She kisses Henry Smith while asleep on St Valentine's morning, and ultimately marries him — Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry II.).

Maid of Saragoza, Augustina, noted for her heroism at the siege of Saragoza, 1808-9. — See Southey's History of the Peninsular War.

Her lower sink—she sheds no ill-limed tear,
Her chin 'tis chin—she fills her fatal pore;
Her frowns flow—she checks their long career—
The—(or rather—she has the sultry lost the spring Gail)
Folded by a woman's hand before a barred wall.
Prynne Calder I. and II.

Maid of the Mill (The), an opera by Isaac Bickersstaff. Patty, the daughter of Fairfield the miller, was brought up by lord Amworth's mother. At the death of lady Amworth, Patty returned to the mill and her father promised her in marriage to Farmer Giles, but Patty refused to marry him. Lord Amworth about the same time betrothed himself to Theodosia, the daughter of sir Harry Sycamore, but the young lady loved Mr. Merwin. When lord Amworth knew of this attachment, he readily yielded up his betrothed to the man of her choice, and selected for his bride Patty "the maid of the mill" (1765).

Maid of the Oaks (The), a two-act drama by J. Burgoyne. Maria "the maid of the Oaks" is brought up by Oldworth of Oldworth Oaks as his ward, but is informed on the eve of her marriage with sir Harry Groveby that she is Oldworth's daughter. The under-plot is between sir Charles Dupely and lady Pab Lardoon. Dupely professed to despise all women, and lady Lardoon as "the princess of dissipation," but after they fell in with each other, Dupely confessed that he would abjure his creed, and lady Lardoon avowed that henceforth she renounced the world of fashion and its follies.

Maid's Tragedy (The). The "maid" is Aspatia the troth-plight wife of Aminator who, at the king's command, is made to marry Laidne (3 syl). Her death forms the tragical event which gives name to the drama — Beaumont and Fletcher (1610).

(The scene between Antony and Ventidius, in Dryden's tragedy of All for Love, is copied from The Maid's Tragedy, where "Melantius" answers to Ventidius.)

Maiden (The), a kind of guillotine, introduced into Scotland by the regent Morton, who was afterwards beheaded by it. The "maiden" resembled in form a painter's easel about ten feet high. The victim placed his head on a cross-bar some four feet from the bottom, except in its place by another bar. In the inner edges of the frame were grooves, in which slid a sharp axe sighted with lead and supported by a long cord When all was ready, the cord was cut and down fell the axe with a thud —Pennant, Tour in Scotland, iii 365 (1771)

The unfortunate curl [Argyll] was appointed to be beheaded by the maiden.—Sir W Scott, Tales of a Grandfather li 53.

The Italian instrument of execution was called the mannata The apparatus was erected on a scaffold the axe was placed between two perpendiculars In Scotland the instrument of execution was an inferior variety of the mannata.—Memoirs of the Saunsons l 57

It seems pretty clear that the maiden is merely a corruption of the Italian mannata —A. G. Peld.

Maiden King (The), Malcolm IV of Scotland (1141, 1153–1165)

Malcolm son of the brave and generous prince Henry was so kind and gentle in his disposition that he was usually called Malcolm the Maiden.—Sir W Scott Tales of a Grandfather lv

Maiden Queen (The), Elizabeth of England (1533, 1558–1603)

Maiden of the Mist (The), Anne of Geierstein, daughter of count Albert of Geierstein She is the baroness of Arnheim.—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Maidens' Castle (The), on the Severn It was taken from a duke by seven knights, and held by them till sir Galahad expelled them It was called "The Maidens' Castle" because these knights made a vow that every maiden who passed it should be made a captive This is an allegory

The Castle of Maidens betokens the good souls that were Christ. And the seven sins which reigned in knight sir Galahad may be likened to the Son of the High Father that Light within a maiden which brought all souls out of thralldom.—Sir T Malory History of Prince Arthur iii 44 (1470)

Mailsetter (Mrs), keeper of the Fairport post-office

Dave Mailsetter, her son.—Sir W Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Maimou'ne (3 syl), a fairy, daughter of Damriat "king of a legion of geni" When the princess Badoura, in her sleep, was carried to the bed of prince Camaralzaman to be shown to him, Maimouné changed herself into a flea, and bit the prince's neck to wake him Whereupon he sees the sleeping princess by his side, falls in love with her, and afterwards marries her.—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura")

Mai'muna or Maimu'na, one of the sorceresses of Dom-Daniel, who repents and turns to Allah Tha'aba first encounters her, disguised as an old woman spinning the finest thread He marvels at its extreme fineness, she tells him he cannot snap it, whereupon he winds it round his two wrists, and becomes powerless Maimuna, with her sister-sorceress Khwala, then carry him to the island of Moha'rob, where he is held in durance, but Maimuna releases him, repents, and dies.—Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer, iv (1797)

Mainote (2 syl), a pirate who infests the coast of Attica boat

Of Island pirate or Mainote
Fyron The Glaucor (1814)

Maimy (Richard), out of whom the Jesuits cast the seven deadly sins, each in the form of some representative animal As each devil came forth, Maimy indicated the special sin by some trick or gesture Thus, for pride he pretended to curl his hair, for gluttony to vomit, for sloth to gape, and so on.—Bishop Harsnett, Declaration of Popish Impostures, 279, 280

Matland (Thomas), the pseudonym of Robert Buchanan in The Contemporary Review, when he attacked the "Fleshy school"

Malachi, the canting, preaching assistant of Thomas Turnbull a smuggler and schoolmaster.—Sir W Scott, Rudgautlet (time, George III)

Malacoda, the fiend sent as an envoy to Virgil, when he conducted Dante through hell.—Dante, Hell, xxi (1300)

Malade Imaginaire (Le), Mons Argan, who took seven mixtures and twelve lavements in one month instead of twelve mixtures with twenty lavements, as he had hitherto done "No wonder," he says, "he is not so well" He fancies his wife loves him dearly, and that his daughter is undutiful, because she declines to marry a young medical prig instead of Cleante (2 syl) whom she loves His brother persuades "the malade" to counterfeit death, in order to test the sincerity of his wife and daughter The wife rejoices greatly at his death, and proceeds to filch his property, when Argan starts up and puts an end to her pillage Next comes the daughter's turn When she hears of her father's death, she bewails him with great grief, says she has lost her best friend, and that she will devote her whole life in prayer for the repose of his soul Argan is delighted, starts up in a frenzy of joy, declares she is a darling, and shall marry the man of her choice freely, and receive a father's blessing —Molière, Le Malade Imaginaire (1673)

Malagigi, son of Buovo, brother of Aldiger and Vivian (of Clarmont's race), one of Charlemagne's paladins, and cousin of Rinaldo. Being brought up by the fairy Orianda, he became a great enchanter —Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Malagrida (Gabriel), an Italian Jesuit and missionary to Brazil, who was accused of conspiring against the king of Portugal (1689-1761)

Lord Shelburne was nicknamed "Malagrida." He was a zealous oppositionist during lord North's administration (1737-1805)

Do you know "said Goldsmith to his lordship that I never could conceive why they call you Malagrida for Malagrida was a very good sort of a man " He meant to say as Malagrida was a good sort of a man "he could not conceive how it became a word of reproach —W. Irving.

Malagrowth (Sir Mungo), a crabbed old courtier, soured by misfortune, and peevish from infirmities. He tries to make every one as sour and discontented as himself —Sir W. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.)

Malagrowth (Malachi), sir Walter Scott, "On the proposed change of currency, etc." (1826)

Lockhart says that these "diatribes produced in Scotland a sensation not inferior to that of the Drapier's letters in Ireland." They came out in the Edinburgh Weekly Journal

Malambruno, a giant, first cousin to queen Maguncia of Candaya. "Exclusive of his natural barbarity, Malambruno was also a wizard," who enchanted don Clavijo and the princess Antonomasiu—the former into a crocodile of some unknown metal, and the latter into a monkey of brass. The giant sent don Quixote the wooden horse, and was appeased "by the simple attempt of the knight to disenchant the victims of his displeasure"—Cervantes, Don Quixote, II in 4, 5 (1615)

Malaprop (Mrs.), aunt and guardian to Lydia Languish the heiress. Mrs. Malaprop sets her cap at sir Lucius O'Trigger, "a tall Irish baronet," and corresponds with him under the name of Delia. Sir Lucius fancies it is the niece, and, when he discovers his mistake, declines the honour of marriage with the aunt. Mrs. Malaprop is a synonym for those who misapply words without mispronouncing them. Thus Mrs. Malaprop talks of a Derbyshire putrefaction, an allegory of the Nile, a barbarous Vandyke, she requests that no delusions to the past be made, talks of flying with the utmost felicity, and would say precipitate one down the prejudice instead of "precipice"—Sheridan, The Rivals (1775)

Mrs. Malaprop mistakes in what she calls 'ortho doxy' have often been objected to as improbable from a woman of her rank of life but the luckiness of her simile 'as headstrong as an allegory on the banks of the Nile' will be acknowledged as [imitable].—T. Moore

Malbecco, "a cankered, crabbed earl," very wealthy and very miserly, husband of a young wife named Helimore (3 syl), of whom he is very jealous, and not without cause. Helimore, falling in love with sir Paridel her guest, sets fire to the closet where her husband keeps his treasures, and elopes with Paridel, while Malbecco stops to put out the flames. This done, Malbecco starts in pursuit, and finds that Paridel has tired of the dame, who has become the satyr's dairy-maid. He soon finds her out, but she declines to return with him, and he, in desperation, throws himself from a rock, but receives no injury. Malbecco then creeps into a cave, feeds on toads and frogs, and lives in terror lest the rock should crush him or the sea overwhelm him. "Dying, he lives on, and can never die," for he is no longer Malbecco, "but JEALOUS is hight"—Spenser, Faery Queen, III 9, 10 (1590)

Malbrough, corrupted in English into Marlbrook, the hero of a popular French song. Generally thought to refer to John Churchill duke of Marlborough, so famous for his victories over the French in the reign of Louis XIV., but no incident of the one corresponds with the life of the other. The Malbrough of the song was evidently a crusader or ancient baron, who died in battle, and his lady, climbing the castle tower and looking out for her lord, reminds one of the mother of Sisera, who "looked out at a window, and cried through the lattice, Why is his chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariots? Have they not sped? Have they not divided the spoil?" (Judges 23-30). The following are the words of the song—

'Malbrough is gone to the wars. Ah! when wilt he return? He will come back by Easter day or at latest by Trinity.' No! No! Later is past and Trinity is past but Malbrough has not returned. Then did she climb the castle tower to look out for his coming. She saw his page, but he was clad in black. My page my bonnie page "cried the lady, what tidings bring you—what tidings of my lord? The news I bring "said the page "is very sad and will make you weep. Lay aside your gay attire lady, your ornaments of gold and silver for my lord is dead. He is dead, lady and laid in They laid him in earth. I saw his spirit rise through the laurels. They planted his grave with rosemary. The nightingale sang his dirge. The mourners fell to the earth, and when they rose up again they chanted his victories. Then retired they all to rest."

This song used to be sung as a lullaby to the infant son of Louis XVI, and Napoleon I never mounted his charger for battle without humming the air of Malbrouk s'en va-t-en guerre. Mon de Las Casas says he heard him hum the same air a little before his death.

Malbrouk, of Basque legend, is a child brought up by his godfather of the same name. At the age of seven he is a tall, full-grown man, and, like Proteus, can assume any form by simply naming the form he wishes to assume. Thus, by saying "Jesus, ant," he becomes an ant, and "Jesus, pigeon," he becomes a pigeon. After performing most wonderful prodigies, and releasing the king's three daughters who had been stolen by his godfather, he marries the youngest of the princesses, and succeeds the king on his throne.

* * * The name Malbrouk occurs in the Chanson de Gestes, and in the Basque Pastorales (See above, MALUROGAI).

Malcolm, surnamed "Can More" ("great head"), eldest son of Duncan "the Neck" king of Scotland. He, with his father and a younger brother, was a guest of Macbeth at Inverness Castle, when Duncan was murdered. The two young princes fled—Malcolm to the English court, and his brother Donaldbain to Ireland. When Macduff slew Macbeth in the battle of Dunsinane, the son of Duncan was set on the throne of Scotland, under the name and title of Malcolm III—Shakespeare, Macbeth (1606).

Malebolge (4 syl), the eighth circle of Dante's inferno. It was divided into ten bolgi, or pits.

There is a place within the depths of hell Called Malebolge.

Dante Hell VIII. (1300)

Mal'ecasta, the mistress of Castlo Joyous, and the impersonation of lust. Britomart (the heroine of chastity) entered her bower, after overthrowing four of the six knights who guarded it, and Malecasta sought to win the stranger to wantonness, not knowing her sex. Of course, Britomart resisted all her wiles, and left the castle next morning—Faery Queen, III, 1 (1590).

Maledisaunt, a damsel who threw discredit on her knightly lover to prevent his encountering the danger of the battle-field. Sir Launcelot condoned her offence, and gave her the name of Bien-pensaunt.

The Cape of Good Hope was called the "Cape of Storms" (Cabo Tormentoso) by Bartholomew Diaz, when discovered in 1493, but the king of Portugal (John II) changed the name to "Good Hope."

So the Enxine (that is, "the hospitable") Sea was originally called "The Axine" (or "the inhospitable") Sea.

Maleffort, seneschal of lady Brin'na, a man of "nuckle might," slain by sir Calidore—Spenser, Faery Queen, VI, 1 (1596).

Malo'ger (3 syl), captain of the host which besieged Body Castle, of which Alma was queen. Prince Arthur found that his sword was powerless to wound him, so he took him up in his arms and tried to crush him, but without effect. At length the prince remembered that the earth was the earl's mother, and supplied him with new strength and vigour as often as he went to her for it, so he earned the body, and slung it into a lake (See ANTROS)—Spenser, Faery Queen, II, 11 (1590).

Malen'gin, Gule personified. When attacked by Talus, he changed himself into a fox, a bush, a bird, a hedgehog, and a snake, but Talus, with his iron flail, beat him to powder, and so "deceit did the deceiver fail." On his back Malengin carried a net "to catch fools" with—Spenser, Faery Queen, V, 9 (1596).

Malopaidus, the castle of Master Reynard the fox, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498).

Males and Females. The proportion in England is 104.5 males to 100 females, in Russia it is 108.9, and the Jews in Livonia give the ratio of 120 males born to every 100 females. The mortality of males in infancy exceeds that of females, and war greatly disturbs the balance.

Mal-Fet (The chevalier), the name assumed by sir Launcelot in Joyous Isle, during his fit of madness, which lasted two years—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, III (1470).

Malfort (Mal), a young man who has ruined himself by speculation.

Mrs Malfort, the wife of the specu-

Sir Toby and sir Andrew Ague-cheek join Maria in a trick against the steward Marin forges a letter in the handwriting of Olivia, leading Malvolio to suppose that his mistress is in love with him, telling him to dress in yellow stockings, and to smile on the lady. Malvolio falls into the trap, and when Olivia shows astonishment at his absurd conduct, he keeps quoting parts of the letter he has received, and is shut up in a dark room as a lunatic — Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (1611)

Cleaving his voice with a preliminary "Hem!" he addressed his kinsman, checking as Malvolio proposed to do when seated in his state, his familiar smile with an austere regard of control. — Sir W. Scott

Len-Jer's "Malvolio" was simply perfection. His legs in yellow stockings most villainously crossed, quartered with a horrible laugh of ugly conceit to top the whole rendered him Shakespeare's Malvolio at all points [1738-1811]. — Bowden Life of Jordan

Mamamouchi, an imaginary order of knighthood M Jourdain, the parvenu, is persuaded that the grand seignior of the order has made him a member, and he submits to the ceremony of a mock installation — Moliere, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (1670)

All the women most devoutly swear
Each would be rather a poor actress here
Than to be made a Mamamouchi there

Dryden

Mambrino's Helmet, a helmet of pure gold, which rendered the wearer invisible. It was taken possession of by Rinaldo, and stolen by Scarpantio

Cervantes tells us of a barber who was caught in a shower of rain, and who, to protect his hat, clipped his brizen basin on his head. Don Quixote insisted that this basin was the helmet of the Moorish king, and, taking possession of it, wore it as such

"* * * When the knight set the galleyslaves free, the rascals "snatched the basin from his head, and broke it to pieces" (pt I in 8), but we find it sound and complete in the next book (ch 15), when the gentlemen at the inn sit in judgment on it, to decide whether it is really a "helmet or a basin." The judges, of course, humour the don, and declare the basin to be an undoubted helmet — Cervantes, Don Quixote (1605)

I will lead the life I have mentioned till by the force and terror of my arm I take a helmet from the head of some other knight. The same thing happened about Mambrino's helmet which cost Scarpantio so dear — Cervantes Don Quixote I. II. — (1605).

Mamilius, a young prince of Sicilia — Shakespeare, Winter's Tale (1604) on, the personification of hly ambition, be it wealth, honours, sensuality, or what not "Ye cannot serve God and mammon" (Matt vi 24) Milton makes Mammon one of the rebellious angels

Mammon the first-erected spirit that fell
From heaven for e'en in heaven his looks and thought
Were always downward bent admiring more
The riches of heaven's pavement, trodden gold
Than aught, divine or holy else enjoyed.
Paradise Lost I. 679 etc. (1663)

Mammon tells sir Guyon if he will serve him, he shall be the richest man in the world, but the knight replies that money has no charm in his sight. The god then takes him into his smithy, and tells him to give any order he likes, but sir Guyon declines the invitation. Mammon next offers to give the knight Philotime to wife, but sir Guyon still declines. Lastly, the knight is led to Proserpine's bower, and told to pluck some of the golden fruit, and to rest him awhile on the silver stool, but sir Guyon resists the temptation. After three days' sojourn in the infernal regions, the knight is led back to earth, and swoons — Spenser, Fairy Queen, ii 7 (1590)

Mammon (Sir Epicure), the rich dupe who supplies Subtle "the alchemist" with money to carry on his artifices, under pretence of transmuting base metals into gold. Sir Epicure believes in the possibility, and glories in the mighty things he will do when the secret is discovered — Ben Jonson, The Alchemist (1610)

[Sir] Epicure Mammon has the whole 'matter and end' of the father—eye nose lip the trick of his frown "It is in such a manner as contemporaries have described Len to be. He is arrogance personified. What a lowering bravery there is in his sensuality! He affects no pleasure under a sultan — C. Lamb

Mammoth (The) or big buffalo is an emblem of terror and destruction among the American Indians. Hence, when Brandt, at the head of a party of Mohawks and other savages, was laying waste Pennsylvania, and approached Wyomung, Outalissi exclaims

The mammoth comes—the foe—the monster Brandt,
With all his howling desolating band
He is the cup they drink but not of wine!
Campbell Gertrude of Wyoming III 16 (1829).

Mammoth Cave (The), in Edmondson County, Kentucky. It is the largest in the world

Mammoth Grove (The), in California. Some of the trees grow to the height of from 200 to 300 feet, and have a girth of from 100 to 200 feet

Mammoun, eldest of the four sons of Corcud. One day, he showed kindness to a mutilated serpent, which proved to be the fairy Gialout, who gave him for his humanity the power of joining and mending whatever was broken. He mended a pie's egg which was smashed into twenty pieces, and so perfectly that the egg was hatched. He also mended in a moment a ship which had been wrecked and broken in a violent storm — T. S. Gueulette, Chinese Tales ("Coreud and His Four Sons," 1723)

Man His descent according to the Darwinian theory (1) the larva of ascidians, a marine mollusc, (2) fish lowly organized, as the lancelet, (3) ganoids, lepidosiren, and other fish, (4) amphibians, (5) birds and reptiles, (6) from reptiles we get the monotremata, which connects reptiles with the mammals, (7) the marsupials, (8) placental mammals, (9) lemuriæ, (10) simiæ, (11) the New World monkeys called platyrrhines, and the Old World monkeys called catarrhines, (12) between the catarrhines and the race of man the "missing link" is placed by some, but others think between the highest organized ape and the lowest organized man the gradation is simple and easy.

Man (Isle of), a corruption of man-au ("little island"), Latinized into Menavia. Cæsar calls it "Mon-a," the Scotch pronunciation of man-au, and hence comes "Monabin" for Menavia.

Man (Races of) According to the Bible, the whole human race sprang from one individual, Adam. Virey affirms there were two original pairs. Jacquinet and Latham divide the race into three primordial stocks, Kant into four, Blumenbach into five, Buffon into six, Hunter into seven, Agassiz into eight, Pickering into eleven, Bory St. Vincent into fourteen, Desmoulins into sixteen, Morton into twenty-two, Crawford into sixty, and Burke into sixty-three.

Man in Black (The), said to be meant for Goldsmith's father. A true oddity, with the tongue of a Timon and the heart of an uncle Toby. He declaims against beggars, but relieves every one he meets, he ridicules generosity, but would share his last cloak with the needy — Goldsmith, Citizen of the World (1759).

 Washington Irving has a tale called The Man in Black.

Man in the Moon (The) Some say it is the man who picked up a bundle of sticks on the sabbath day (Numb. xv. 32-36). Dante says it is Cain, and that the "bush of thorns" is an emblem of the curse pronounced on the earth. "Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee" (Gen. iii. 18). Some say it is Indymion, taken there by Diana.

The curse pronounced on the "man" was this: "As you regarded not 'Sunday' on earth, you shall keep a perpetual 'Moon-day' in heaven." This, of course, is a Teutonic tradition.

The bush of thorns, in the Schanburg-hippé version, is to indicate that the man strewn thorns in the church path, to hinder people from attending mass on Sundays.

Now doth Cain with fork of thorns confine
On either hemisphere touching the wide
Length the towers of Scville yesternight
The moon was round.

Dante Inferno xv. (1306)

Her gite way gray and full of spottis black
And on her breast a chorle painted ful even Lering a bush o' thorns on his back
Which for his theft might clime so ner the heven

Chaucer

A North Russian version gives cabbages instead of a faggot of wood.

 There are other traditions, among which may be mentioned "The Story of the Hare and the Elephant." In this story "the man in the moon" is a hare — Pantechatantia (a collection of Sanskrit fables).

Man in the Moon, a man who visits the "inland parts of Africa" — W. Thomson, Mammuth or Human Nature Displayed on a Grand Scale (1789).

Man in the Moon, the man who, by the aid of a magical glass, shows Charles Fox (the man of the people) various eminent contemporaries — W. Thomson, The Man in the Moon or Travels into the Lunar Regions (1783).

Man of Blood. Charles I. was so called by the puritans, because he made war on his parliament. The allusion is to 2 Sam. xvi. 7.

Man of Brass, Talos, the work of Hephestos (Vulcan). He traversed the Isle of Crete three a year. Apollonius (Argonautica, iv.) says he threw rocks at the Argonauts, to prevent their landing. It is also said that when a stranger was discovered on the island, Talos made himself red hot, and embraced the intruder to death.

That portentous Man of Brass
Hephestos made in days of yore
Who stalked about the Cretan shore
And saw the ships appear and go,
And threw stones at the Argonauts.

Longfellow, The Haystack Inn (1863).

Man of December, Napoleon III
So called because he was made president December 11, 1848; made the coup d'état, December 2, 1851, and was made emperor, December 2, 1852

(Born in the Rue Lafayette, Paris (not in the Tuileries), April 20, 1808, reigned 1852-1870, died at Chislehurst, Kent, January 9, 1873)

Man of Destiny, Napoleon I, who always looked on himself as an instrument in the hands of destiny, and that all his acts were predestined

The Man of Destiny had power for a time to blind kings with chains and nobles with fetters of iron — Sir W. Scott.

Man of Feeling (The), Harley, a sensitive, bashful, kind-hearted, sentimental sort of a hero — H. Mackenzie, The Man of Feeling (1771)

* * Sometimes Henry Mackenzie is himself called "The Man of Feeling"

Man of Ross, John Kyrle, of Ross, in Herefordshire, distinguished for his benevolence and public spirit "Rieber than miser, nobler than king or king-polluted lord" — Pope, Epistle, III ("On the Use of Riches," 1709)

Man of Salt (A), a man like Aeneas, always melting into tears called "drops of salt"

This would make a man a man of salt
To use his eyes for garden water pots
Shakespeare King Lear act IV sc 6 (1605)

Man of Sedan, Napoleon III So called because he surrendered his sword to William king of Prussia after the battle of Sedan in September, 1870

Also called the "Man of Silence"
(See above, first article)

Man of Sin (The), mentioned in 2 Thess II 3

Whitby says the "Man of sin" means the Jews as a people

Grotius says it means Caius Cæsar or else Caligula

Wetstein says it is Titus

Olshausen thinks it is typical of some one yet to come

Roman Catholics say it means Antichrist

Protestants think it refers to the pope
The Fifth-Monarchy men applied it to Cromwell

Man of the Hill, a tedious "bermunt of the vale," introduced by Fielding into his novel of Tom Jones (1749)

Man of the Mountain (Old)
(See KORRENBURG, p 526)

Man of the People, Charles James Fox (1749-1806)

Man of the Sea (The Old), the man who got upon the shoulders of Sindbad the sailor, and would not get off again, but clung there with obstinate pertinacity till Sindbad made him drunk, when he was easily shaken off Sindbad then crushed him to death with a large stone

You had fallen said they into the hands of the Old Man of the Sea and you are the first whom he has not strangled. — Arabian Nights (Sindbad's fifth voyage)

Man of the World (The), sir Pertinax McSycephant, who acquires a fortune by "boozing" and fawning on the great and rich He wants his son Egerton to marry the daughter of lord Lumbeecourt, but Egerton, to the disgust of his father, marries Constantia the protégée of lady McSycephant Sir Pertinax had promised his lordship a good round sum of money if the marriage was effected, and when this contempt occurs, his lordship laments the loss of money, "which will prove his ruin" Sir Pertinax tells lord Lumbeecourt that his younger son Sandy will prove more pliable, and it is agreed that the bargain shall stand good if Sandy will marry the young lady — C. Macklin, The Man of the World (1764)

* * This comedy is based on Voltaire's Nanine (1749)

Man without a Skin Richard Cumberland the dramatist was so called by Garrick, because he was so extremely sensitive that he could not bear "to be touched" by the finger of criticism (1782-1811)

Managarm, the most gigantic and formidable of the race of hags He dwells in the Iron-wood, Jamvid Managarm will first fill himself with the blood of man, and then will he swallow up the moon This gigantic hag symbolizes War, and the "Iron-wood" in which he dwells is the wood of spears — Prose Edda

Manchester (American), Lowell, in Massachusetts So called from its cotton-mills

Manchester of Belgium, Ghent

Manchester of Prussia, Elberfeld The speciality of Prussian Manchester is its "Turkey red" Krupp is the chief manufacturer there of steel

Manchester Poet (The), Charles Span, born 1803, of lifting and halting itself into an expression that was not quite one of perplexity or wonder or alarm or merely of bright fixed attention though it included all the four expressions.—C Dickens A Tale of Two Cities, l 4 (18-9)

Maney or MANN (Sir Walter), a native of Belgium, who came to England as page to Philippa queen of Edward III. When he first began his career of arms, he and some young companions of his own age put a black patch over their left eye, and vowed never to remove it till they had performed some memorable act in the French wars (died 1372)

With whom our Maney here deservedly doth stand
Which first inventor was of that courageous band
Who closed their left eyes up as never to be freed
Till there they had achieved some high adventurous deed.
Dryden Polyolion xviii. (1613)

Man'fred (Count), son of Sig'ismund. He sells himself to the prince of darkness, and received from him seven spirits to do his bidding. They were the spirits of "earth, ocean, air, night, mountains, winds, and the star of his own destiny." Wholly without human sympathies, the count dwelt in splendid solitude among the Alpine Mountains. He once loved the beautiful As'tarte (2 syl), and, after her murder, went to the hall of Arima'nês to see her. The spirit of Astarte informed him that he would die the following day, and when asked if she loved him, she sighed "Manfred," and vanished.—Byron, Manfred (1817)

* * Byron sometimes makes Astarte two syllables and sometimes three. The usual pronunciation is As-tarte

Mangerton (The laird of), John Armstrong, an old warrior who witnesses the national combat in Liddesdale valley between his own son (the Scotch champion) and Foster (the English champion). The laird's son is vanquished.—Sir W Scott, The Lady's Jock (time, Elizabeth)

Maniche'an (4 syl), a disciple of Manês or Manachée the Persian heresiarch. The Manicheans believe in two opposing principles—one of good and the other of evil. Theodora, wishing to exterminate these heretics, sent 100,000 of them to the sword.

Yet would she make full many a Manichean
Byron Don Juan xl 3 (1824)

Manicon, a species of nightshade, supposed to produce madness.

Man'ito or Mani'tou, the Great Spirit of the North American Indians. These Indians acknowledge two supreme spirits—a spirit of good and a spirit of evil. The former they call Gitchê-Manito, and the latter Mitchê-Manito.

The good spirit is symbolized by an egg, and the evil one by a serpent.—Longfellow, Hiawatha, xiv

As when the evil Manitou that dries
The Ohio woods, consumes them in his ire
Campbell Gertrude of Wyoming l 17 (1809)

Manlius, surnamed Torquatus, the Roman consul. In the Latin war, he gave orders that no Roman, on pain of death, should engage in single combat. One of the Latins having provoked young Manlius by repeated insults, he slew him, but when the young man took the spoils to his father, Manlius ordered him to be put to death for violating the commands of his superior officer.—Roman Story

Man'lius Capitolin'us, consul of Rome B.C. 392, then military tribune. After the battle of Allia (390), seeing Rome in the power of the Gauls, he threw himself into the capitol with 1000 men, surprised the Gauls, and put them to the sword. It was for this achievement he was called Capitolinus. Subsequently he was charged with aiming at sovereignty, and was hurled to death from the Tarpeian Rock.

* * Lafosse (1698) has a tragedy called Manlius Capitolinus, and "Manlius" was one of the favourite characters of Talma the French actor. Lafosse's drama is an imitation of Otway's tragedy of Tenice Preserved (1682).

Manly, the lover of lady Grace Townly sister-in-law of lord Townly. Manly is the cousin of sir Francis Wronghead, whom he saves from utter ruin. He is noble, judicious, upright, and sets all things right that are going wrong.—Vanbrugh and Cibber, The Provoked Husband (1728).

The address and manner of Dennis Delane [1709-1733] were easy and polite, and he excelled in the well bred man such as Manly.—T Davies.

Manly, "the plain dealer." An honest, surly sea-captain, who thinks every one a rascal, and believes himself to be no better. Manly forms a good contrast to Olivia, who is a consummate hypocrite of most unblushing effrontery.

"Counterfeit honours," says Manly, "will not be current with me. I weigh the man, not his title." 'Tis not the king's stamp can make the metal better or heavier.—Wycherly The Plain Dealer l 1 (1677)

* * Manly, the plain dealer, is a copy of Molière's "Misanthrope," the prototype of which was the dne de Montausier.

Manly (Captain), the fiancé of Arbella ward of justice Dav and an heiress.

Arms. I like him much—he seems plain and honest.
Such plainness ought in all conscience
To knight the honest soldier.

Manly (Colonel), a bluff, honest soldier, to whom honour is dearer than life. The hero of the drama—Mrs Centlivre, The Beau's Duel (1703)

Mann (Mrs), a dishonest, grasping woman, who kept a branch workhouse, where children were farmed. Oliver Twist was sent to her child-farm. Mrs Mann systematically starved the children placed under her charge—C Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Mannara, goddess of retribution. The word in Italian means "an eye for an eye."

All in a terrible moment came the blow
That beat down Paolo's fence, ended the play
O the foal and brought Manna on the stage
R. Browning The Ring and the Book, lib. (date of the story 1457)

Mannerling (Guy) or colonel Mannering

Mrs Mannerling (née Sophia Wellwood), wife of Guy Mannerling

Julia Mannerling, daughter of Guy. She marries captain Bertram. "Rather a hare-brained girl, but well deserving the kindest regards" (act 1, 2 of the dramatized version)

Sir Paul Mannerling, uncle to Guy Mannerling—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannerling (time, George II)

* * Scott's tale of Guy Mannerling has been dramatized by Daniel Terry

Mano'a, the fabulous capital of Il Dora'do, the houses of which city were roofed with gold. El Dorado was said to be situated on the west shore of Lake Parime, at the mouth of a large river

Manon L'Escout, the heroine of a French novel entitled Histoire de Chevalier Desgrioux et de Manon Lescot, by A. I. Prevost (1733). Manon is the "fair mischief" of the story. Her charms seduce and ruin the chevalier des Grioux, who marries her. After marriage, the selfish mistress becomes converted into the faithful wife, who follows her husband into disgrace and banishment, and dies by his side in the wilds of America

* * The object of this novel, like that of La Dame aux Camélias, by Dumas fils (1848), is to show how true-hearted, how self-sacrificing, how attractive, a fille de joie may be

Manrico, the supposed son of Azucena the gypsy, but in reality the son of Garzia (brother of the conte di Luna). Leonora is in love with him, but the count entertains a base passion for her, and, getting Manrico into his power, condemns him to death. Leonora promises the count to give herself to him if he will spare the life of Manrico. He consents, but while he goes to release his "nephew," Leonora sucks poison from a ring and dies. Manrico, on perceiving this, dies also—Verdi, Il Trovatore (an opera, 1853)

Man's, a fashionable coffee-house in the reign of Charles II

Mans (The count of), Roland, nephew of Charlemagne. He is also called the "knight of Blanches"

Mansel (Sir Edward), lieutenant of the Tower of London

Lady Mansel, wife of sir Edward—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Mansfield (The Miller of), a humorous, good-natured countryman, who offered Henry VIII hospitality when he had lost himself in a hunting expedition. The miller gave the king half a bed with his son Richard. Next morning, the courtiers were brought to the cottage by under-keepers, and Henry, in merry pin, knighted his host, who thus became sir John Cokle. He then made him "overseer of Sherwood Forest," with a salary of 1000 marks a year—R. Dodsley, The King and the Miller of Mansfield (1737)

* * In the ballad called The King and the Miller of Mansfield, the king is Henry II, and there are several other points of difference between the ballad and the play. In the play, Cokle hears a gun fired, and goes out to look for poachers, when he lays hold of the king, but, being satisfied that he is no porcher, he takes him home. In the ballad, the king out-rides his lords, gets lost, and, meeting the miller, asks of him a night's lodging. When the miller feels satisfied with the face and bearing of the stranger, he entertains him right hospitably. He gives him for supper a venison pasty, but tells him on no account to tell the king "that they made free with his deer." Another point of difference is this. In the play, the courtiers are seized by the under-keepers, and brought to Cokle's house, but in the ballad they track the king and appear before him next morning. In the play, the king settles on sir John Cokle 1000 marks, in the ballad, £300 a year—Percy, Reliques, III, p. 20

(Of course, as Dodsley introduced the "firing of a gun," he was obliged to bring down his date to more modern times, and none of the Henrys between Henry II and Henry VIII would be the least likely to indulge in such a prank)

Mansur (Ilyah), a warrior, prophet, and priest, who taught a more tolerant form of Islâm, but not being an orthodox Moslem, he was condemned to imprisonment in the howels of a mountain. Mansur is to re-appear and wave his conquering sword, to the terror of the Museovite—Milner, Gallery of Geography, 781 (See BARNAROSS)

Mantacci'ni, a charlatan, who professed to restore the dead to life

Mantali'ni (Madame), a fashionable milliner near Cavendish Square, London. She dotes upon her husband, and supports him in idleness

Mi Mantalini, the husband of madame, he is a min-doll and cockney fop, noted for his white teeth, his minced oaths, and his gorgeous morning gown. This "exquisite" lives on his wife's earnings, and thinks he confers a favour on her by lavishing her money on his selfish indulgences—C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Mantle (The Boy and the) One day, a little boy presented himself before King Arthur, and showed him a curious mantle "which would become no wife that was not leal" to her true lord. The queen tried it on, but it changed its colour and fell into shreds, sir Kay's lady tried it on, but with no better success, others followed, but only sir Cradoek's wife could wear it—Perev, Reliques

Mantuan (The), that is, Baptista Spig'nolus, surnamed Mantuanus, from the place of his birth. He wrote poems and eclogues in Latin. His works were translated into English by George Tupper in 1567. He lived 1443-1516

Ah, good old Mantuan! I may speak of thee as the traveller doth of Venice

Vinea, Vinea.

Marcassin (Prince) This nursery tale is from the Nights, of Straparola, an Italian (sixteenth century). Translated into French in 1685

Marcella, the "Desdemona" of Massinger's Duke of Milan. Sforza "the More" doted on his young bride, and Marcella returned his love. During Sforza's absence at the camp, Francesco, "the lord protector," tried to seduce the young bride from her fidelity, and, failing in his purpose, accused her to the duke of wishing to play the wanton. "I laboured to divert her, urged your much love, but hourly she pursued me." The duke, in a paroxysm of jealousy, flew on Marcella and slew her—Massinger, The Duke of Milan (1622)

Marcella, daughter of William a farmer. Her father and mother died while she was young, leaving her in charge of an uncle. She was "the most beautiful creature ever sent into the world," and every bachelor who saw her fell madly in love with her, but she declined their suits. One of her lovers was

Chrysostom, the favourite of the village, who died of disappointed hope, and the shepherds wrote on his tombstone "From Chrysostom's fate, learn to abhor Marcell, that common enemy of man, whose beauty and cruelty are both in the extreme"—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I 11 4, 5 (1605)

Margar'elon (4 syl), a Trojan hero of modern fable, who performed deeds of marvellous bravery. Lydgate, in his Boke of Troy (1513), calls him a son of Priam. According to this authority, Margarelon attacked Achilles, and fell by his hand

Margaret, only child and heiress of sir Giles Overreach. Her father set his heart on her marrying lord Lovel, for the summit of his ambition was to see her a peeress. But Margaret was modest, and could see no happiness in ill-assorted marriages, so she remained faithful to Tom Allworth, the man of her choice.—Massinger, A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1628)

Margaret, wife of Vandunke (2 syl) the drunken burgomaster of Bruges.—Bernmont and Fletcher, The Beggars' Bush (1622)

Margaret (Ladye), "the flower of Teviot," daughter of the duchess Margaret and lord Walter Scott of Branksome Hall. The ladye Margaret was beloved by Henry of Cranstown, whose family had a deadly feud with that of Scott. One day, the elfin page of lord Cranstown conveyed the heir of Branksome Hall (then a lad) into the woods, where the boy fell into the hands of the Southerners. The captors then marched with 3000 men against the castle of the widowed duchess, but being told by a spy that Douglas, with 10,000 men, was coming to the rescue, an arrangement was made to decide by single combat whether the boy should become king Edward's page, or be delivered up into the hands of his mother. The English champion (sir Richard Musgrave) fell by the hand of sir William

Deloraine, and the boy was delivered to his mother. It was then discovered that sir William was in reality lord Cranstown, who claimed and received the hand of the fair Margaret as his reward.—Sir W Scott, Lay of the Last Minstrel (1805)

Margaret, the heroine of Goethe's Faust. Faust first encounters her on her return from church, falls in love with her, and seduces her. Overcome with shame, she destroys the infant to which she gives birth, and is condemned to death. Faust attempts to save her, and, gaining admission to her cell, finds her huddled up on a bed of straw, singing, like Ophelia, wild snatches of ancient ballads, her reason faded, and her death at hand. Faust tries to persuade the mad girl to flee with him, but in vain. At last the day of execution arrives, and with it Mephistopheles, passionless and grim. Faust is hurried off, and Margaret is left to her fate. Margaret is often called by the pet diminutive "Gretehen," and in the opera "Margherita" (7 s.)—Goethe, Faust (1790)

Shakespeare has drawn no such portrait as that of Margaret, no such peculiar union of passion, simplicity, homeliness, and witchery. The poverty and inferior social position of Margaret are never lost sight of—she never becomes an abstraction. It is love alone which exalts her above her station.—Lewes.

Margaret Catchpole, a Suffolk celebrity, born at Nacton, in that county, in 1773, the title and heroine of a tale by the Rev R Cobbold. She falls in love with a smuggler named Will Lud, and in 1797, in order to reach him, steals a horse from Mr J Cobbold, brewer, of Ipswich, in whose service she had lived much respected. She dresses herself in the groom's clothes, and makes her way to London, where she is detected while selling the horse, and is put in prison. She is sentenced to death at the Suffolk assizes—a sentence afterwards commuted to one of seven years' transportation. Owing to a difficulty in sending prisoners to New South Wales, she is confined in Ipswich jail, but from here she makes her escape, joins Lud, who is shot in her defence. Margaret is recaptured, and again sentenced to death, which is for the second time commuted to transportation, this time for life, and she arrives at Port Jackson in 1801. Here, by her good behaviour, she obtains a free pardon, and ultimately marries a former lover named John Barry, who had emigrated and risen to a high position in the colony. She died, much respected, in the year 1841.

Margaret Finch, queen of the pipers. She was born at Sutton, in Kent (1611), and finally settled in Norway. From a constant habit of sitting on the ground, with her chin on her knee, she was unable to stand, and when dead was buried in a square box, 1740, aged 100 years.

Margaret Gibson afterwards called Potter, a famous Scotch cook, who was employed in the palace of James I. She was born in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and died June 26, 1719, either 113 or 114 years of age.

Margaret Lamburn one of the servants of Mary queen of Scots who undertook to witness the death of her royal mistress. For this deed, she dressed in man's clothes and carried two pistols—one to shoot queen Elizabeth and the other herself. She had reached the garden where the queen was walking, when she accidentally dropped one of the pistols as she was seized, carried before the queen, and frantically told her tale. When the queen asked how she expected to be treated, Margaret replied, "A judge would condemn me to death, but it would be more cruel to grant me pardon." The queen said yes, and we hear no more of this female.

Margaret Simon, daughter of Martin Simon the miller of Grenoble, a brave, beautiful, and noble girl—1. Stirling, The Good Man or Maker of Grenoble (1854).

Margaret Street, Portman Square, London. So called from Margaret, only child of Edward second earl of Oxford and Mortimer (See Britannica).

Margaret of Anjou, widow of King Henry VI of England. She presents herself, disguised as a mendicant, in Salisbury Cathedral, to Philipson (the earl of Oxford).—Sir W. Scott, Annals of the reigns of Henry IV and Edward IV.

Margaret's Ghost, a ballad by David Mallet (1723). William courted the fair Margaret, but jilted her; he promised love, but broke his promise, and her face was fair, her lips sweet, and her eyes bright, but left the face to pale, the eyes to weep, and the mind to languish and die. Her ghost appeared to him at night to rebuke his heartlessness, and next morning, William left his bed raving mad, hied him to Margaret's grave, thence called her by name, "and never word spake more."

We shall have talks to make of it if it be true with setting forth how a young squire became a hermit, man of law & such, and it will be stuck up with Margaret's ghost as a sort of a sort of every cottage in the country.—1. Illustrations of the History of the Country (1711).

Margaretta, a maiden attached to Robin. Her father wanted her to marry "a stupid old man, because he was rich," so she ran away from home and lived as a ballad-singer. Robin emigrated for three years, and made his fortune. He was wrecked on the coast of Cornwall on his return and met Margaretta at the house of a farmer. Crop his brother-in-law, who the acquaintance was renewed (See No Song, etc.)—Hoare, No Song no Supper (1771-1834).

Margarit'ta (Domia), a Spanish heiress, "fair, young, and wealthy," who resolves to marry that she may the more freely indulge her wantonness. She selects Leon for her husband, because she thinks him a milk-sop, whom she can twist round her thumb at pleasure, but no sooner is Leon married than he shows himself the master. He rules, with great firmness and affection, he wins the esteem of every one, and the wanton coquette becomes a modest, devoted, and obedient wife—Leonard and Fletcher, Love's Wit and Hire a Wife (1610).

Margery (Dick), the old nurse of lady Isoline Burenier "the betrothed"—Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II.).

Margherita, a simple, uncultured girl, of great fascination, seduced by Faust. Margherita killed the infant of her shame, and was sent to jail for so doing. In jail she lost her reason and was condemned to death. When Faust visited her in prison, and tried to persuade her to flee with him, she refused. Faust was carried off by demons, and Margherita was borne by angels up to heaven, the intended moral being, that the repentant sinner is triumphant—Gonoli, Faust Margherita (1859).

Margherita di Valois daughter of Catherine de Medici and Henry II. of France. She married Henry le Bourcien (afterwards Henry IV. of France). It was during the wedding solemnities of Margherita and Henry that Catherine de Medici carried out the massacre of the French huguenots. The bride was at a ball during this horrible slaughter—

Meerbeer, Les Huguenots or Gli Ugonotti (1846)

* * * François I used to call her La Marguerite des Marguerites ("The Pearl of Pearls")

Margia'na (Queen), a mussulman, and mortal enemy of the fire-worshippers Prince Assad became her slave, but, being stolen by the crew of Behram, was carried off. The queen gave chase to the ship, Assad was thrown overboard, and swam to shore. The queen with an army demanded back her slave, discovered that Assad was a prince, and that his half-brother was king of the city to which she had come, whereupon she married him, and carried him home to her own dominions — Arabian Nights ("Amgiad and As'ad")

Margutte (3 syl), a low-minded, vulgar giant, ten feet high, with enormous appetite and of the grossest sensuality. He died of laughter on seeing a monkey pulling on his boots — Pulci, Morgante Maggiore (1488)

Chalehas, the Homeric soothsayer, died of laughter (See LAUGHTER)

Marhaus (Sir), a knight of the Round Table, a king's son, and brother of the queen of Ireland. When sir Mark, king of Cornwall refused to pay tribute to Anguish, king of Ireland, sir Marhaus was sent to defy sir Mark and all his knights to single combat. No one durst go against him, but Tristram said, if Mark would knight him, he would defend his cause. In the combat, sir Tristram was victorious. With his sword he cut through his adversary's helmet and brain-pan, and his sword stuck so fast in the bone that he had to pull three before he could extricate it. Sir Marhaus contrived to get back to Ireland, but soon died — Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, ii 7, 8 (1470)

* * * Sir Marhaus carried a white shield, but as he hated women, twelve damsels spat thereon, to show how they dishonoured him — Ditto, pt 1 75

Maria, a lady in attendance on the princess of France Longaville, a young lord in the suite of Ferdinand king of Navarre, asks her to marry him, but she refers her answer for twelve months. To this Longaville replies, "I'll stay with patience, but the time is long," and Maria makes answer, "The liker you, few taller are so young" — Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Maria, the waiting-woman of the countess Olivia — Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (1614)

Maria, wife of Frederick the un-natural and licentious brother of Alphonso king of Naples. She is a virtuous lady, and appears in strong contrast to her infamous husband — Beaumont and Fletcher, A Wife for a Month (1621)

Maria, daughter and only child of Thorowgood a wealthy London merchant. She is in love with George Barnwell, her father's apprentice, but George is executed for robbery and murder — George Lillo, George Barnwell (1732)

A dying man sent for David Pegg the actor (1758-1790) and addressed him thus. Some forty years ago like George Barnwell, I wronged my master to supply the unbounded extravagance of a Millwood. I took her to see your performance which so shocked me that I vowed to break the connection and return to the path of virtue. I kept my resolution replaced the money I had stolen and found a Maria in my master's daughter. I have now left £1000 affixed to your name in my will and testament — Felham, Chronicles of Crime

Maria, the ward of sir Peter Teazle. She is in love with Charles Surface, whom she ultimately marries — Sheridan, School for Scandal (1777)

Maria, "the maid of the Oaks," brought up as the ward of Oldworth of Oldworth Oaks, but is in reality his daughter and heiress. Maria is engaged to sir Harry Groveby, and Hurry says, "She is the most charmingest, sweetest, delightfulest, mildest, beautifullest, modestest, genteelest young creature in the world" — J. Burgoyne, The Maid of the Oaks

Maria, a maiden whose banns were forbidden "by the curate of the parish who published them," in consequence of which, Maria lost her wits, and used to sit on the roadside near Moulins (2 syl), playing on a pipe vespers hymns to the Virgin. She led by a ribbon a little dog named Silvio, of which she was very jealous, for at one time she had a favourite goat, that forsook her — Sterne, Sentimental Journey (1768)

Maria, a foundling, discovered by Sulpizio a sergeant of the 11th regiment of Napoleon's Grand Army, and adopted by the regiment as their daughter. Tonio, a Tyrolese, saved her life and fell in love with her, but just as they were about to be married the marchioness of Berkenfield claimed the foundling as her own daughter, and the suttler-girl had to quit the regiment for the castle. After a time, the castle was taken by the French, and although the marchioness had promised Maria in marriage to another, she consented to her union with Tomio, who had risen to the rank of a field-officer — Donizetti, La Figlia del Reggimento (an opera, 1840)

Maria [Delaval], daughter of colonel Delaval, plighted to Mr Versatile, but just previous to the marriage Mr Versatile, by the death of his father, came into a large fortune and baronetcy. The marriage was deferred, Mr (now sir George) Versatile went abroad, and became a man of fashion. They met, the attachment was renewed, and the marriage consummated.

Sweetness and smiles played upon her countenance. She was the delight of her friends, the admiration of the world, and the coveted of every eye. Lovers of fortune and fashion contended for her hand, but she had but one heart. — Holcroft, He's Much to Flame v. 2 (1791)

Maria [Winning], daughter of sir Jasper Widing. She is in love with Beaufort, and being promised in marriage against her will to George Philpot, disengages him purposely by her silliness. George refuses to marry her, and she gives her hand to Beaufort — Murphy, The Citizen (1757)

Maria Theresa Panza, wife of Sancho Panza. She is sometimes called Maria, and sometimes Theresa — Cervantes, Don Quixote (1605)

Marriage Forcé (Le) Sganarelle, a rich man of 61, promises marriage to Dorimene (3 syl), a girl under 20, but, having scruples about the matter, consults his friend, two philosophers, and the gipsies, from none of whom can he obtain any practicable advice. At length, he overhears Dorimene telling a young lover that she only marries the old man for his money, and that he cannot live above a few months, so the old man goes to the father, and declines the alliance. On this, the father sends his son to Sganarelle. The young man takes with him two swords, and with the utmost politeness and sans-froid requests Mons to choose one. When the old man declines to do so, the young man gives him a thorough drubbing, and again with the utmost politeness requests the old man to make his choice. On his again declining to do so, he is again beaten, and at last consents to ratify the marriage — Molière, Le Mariage Forcé (1661)

Mariamne (4 syl), a Jewish princess, daughter of Alexander and wife of Herod "the Great." Mariamnè was the mother of Alexander and Aristobolus, both of whom Herod put to death in a fit of jealousy, and then fell into a state of morbid madness, in which he fancied he saw Mariamnè and heard her asking for her sons.

 This has been made the subject of several tragedies, e.g. A Hardy, Mariamne (1623), Pierre Tristram l'Hermitte, Mariamne (1640), Voltaire, Mariamne (1724) —

Marian, "the Muses' only darling," is Margaret countess of Cumberland, sister of Anne countess of Warwick.

Fair Marian the Muses only darling
Whose beauty shineth as the morning clear
With silver dew upon the roses pearly
Spenser Colin Clouts Come Home Again (1593)

Marian, "the parson's maid," in love with Colin Clout who loves Cicely. Marian sings a ditty of dole, in which she laments for Colin, and says how he gave her once a knife, but "Woe is me! for knives, they tell me, always sever love" — Gay, Pastorals, ii (1711)

Marian, "the daughter" of Robert a wreeker, and betrothed to Edward a young sailor. She was fair in person, loving, and holy. During the absence of Edward at sea, a storm arose, and Robert went to the coast to look for plunder. Marian followed him, and in the dusk saw some one stab another. She thought it was her father, but it was Black Norris. Her father being taken up, Marian gave evidence against him, and the old man was condemned to death. Norris now told Marian he would save her father if she would become his wife. She made the promise, but was saved the misery of the marriage by the arrest of Norris for murder — S Knowles, The Daughter (1836)

Marian'a, a lovely and lovable lady, married to Angelo (deputy duke of Vienna), by civil contract, but not by religious rites. Her pleadings to the duke for Angelo are wholly unavailing — Shakespeare, Measure for Measure (1603)

Timid and shrinking before she does not now wait to be encouraged in her suit. She is instant and importunate. She does not reason with the duke, she begs she implores. — R. G. White

Mariana, sister of Ludovico Sforza duke of Milan, and wife of Francesco his chief minister of state — Massinger, The Duke of Milan (1622)

Mariana, daughter of lord Charney, taken prisoner by the English, and in love with Arnold (friend of the Black Prince) Just before the battle of Poitiers, thinking the English cause hopeless, Mariana induces Arnold to desert, but Lord Charney will not receive him. Arnold returns to the English camp, and dies in the battle. Lord Charney is also slain, and Mariana dies distracted — Shirley, Edward the Black Prince (1640)

Mariana, the young lady that Lovegold the miser wished to marry. As Mariana was in love with the miser's son Frederick, she pretended to be extravagant and deeply in debt, which so affected the old hunk, that he gave her £2000 to be let off the bargain. Of course she assented, and married Frederick — H. Fielding, The Miser

Mariana, the daughter of a Swiss burgher, "the most beautiful of women." Her gentleness a smile without a smile, a sweetness of look, speech, act. Leonardo being crushed by an avalanche, she nursed him through his illness, and they fell in love with each other. He started for Mantua, but was detained for two years captive by a gang of thieves, and Mariana followed him, being unable to support life where he was not. In Mantua count Florio fell in love with her, and obtained her guardian's consent to their union, but Mariana refused, was summoned before the duke (Ferrardo), and judgment was given against her. Leonardo, being present at the trial, now threw off his disguise, and was acknowledged to be the real duke. He assumed his rank, married Mariana, but being called to the camp, left Ferrardo regent. Ferrardo, being a villain, laid a cunning scheme to prove Mariana guilty of adultery with Julian St. Pierre, a countryman, but Leonardo refused to believe the charge. Julian, who turned out to be Mariana's brother, exposed the whole plot of Ferrardo, and amply cleared his sister of the slightest taint or thought of a revolt — S. Knowles, The Wife (1833)

Mariana, daughter of the king of Thessaly. She was beloved by sir Alexander, one of the three sons of St. George the patron saint of England. Sir Alexander married her, and became king of Thessaly — R. Johnson, The Seven Champions of Christendom, in 2, 3, 11 (1617)

Mariana in the Moated Grange, a young damsel who sits in the moated grange, looking out for her lover, who never comes, and the burden of her life-

song is, "My life is dreary, for he cometh not, I am weary, and would that I were dead!"

The sequel is called Mariana in the South, in which the love-lorn maiden looks forward to her death, "when she will cease to be alone, to live forgotten, and to love forlorn" — Penny son, Mariana (in two parts)

* * Mariana, the lady betrothed to Angelo, passed her sorrowful hours "at the Moated Grange." Thus the duke says to Isabella

Haste you speedily to Angelo. I will presently to St. Luke's. There at the moated grange resides the dejected Mariana. — Shakespeare Measure for Measure act III. sc. 1 (1603)

Marianne (3 syl), a statuette to which the red republicans of France pay homage. It symbolizes the republic, and is arrayed in a red Phrygian cap. This statuette is sold at earthenware shops, and in republican clubs, enthroned in glory, and sometimes it is carried in procession to the tune of the Marseillaise. (See MARY ANNE)

The reason seems to be this. Ravalliac, the assassin of Henri IV (the Harmodius or Aristogiton of France), was honoured by the red republicans as "patriot, deliverer, and martyr." This regicide was incited to his deed of blood by reading the celebrated treatise De Rege et Reipublica Institutione, by Mariana the Jesuit, published 1599 (about ten years previously). As Mariana inspired Ravalliac "to deliver France from her tyrant" (Henri IV), the name was attached to the statuette of liberty, and the republican party generally.

The association of the name with the guillotine favours this suggestion.

Marianne (3 syl), the heroine of a French novel so called by Marivaux (1688-1763)

(This novel terminates abruptly, with a conclusion like that of Zadig, "where nothing is concluded.")

Marianne [Franval], sister of Franval the advocate. She is a beautiful, loving, gentle creature, full of the deeds of kindness, and brimming over with charity. Marianne loves captain St. Alme, a merchant's son, and though her mother opposes the match as beneath the rank of the family, the advocate pleads for his sister, and the lovers are duly betrothed to each other — F. Holcroft, The Deaf and Dumb (1785)

Carrivort) —Spenser, Fairy Queen, iii 5 (1590)

Marie (Catherine), the mother of Ulricus (a love-daughter), the father of Ulrica being Ernest de Fridberg, "the prisoner of State" Marie married count DO born, on condition of his obtaining the acquittal of her lover Ernest de Fridberg; but the count broke his promise, and even attempted to get the prisoner smothered in his dungeon. His villainy being made known, the king ordered him to be executed, and Ernest, being set at liberty, duly married the countess Marie —1 Shilling, The Prisoner of State (1847)

Marie de Brabant, daughter of Henry III. duc de Brabant. She married Philippe le Bon, king of France, and was accused by the brood of having poisoned Philippe's son by his former wife Jean de Brabant defended the queen's innocence by combat, and being the victor, Labrousse was hung (1369-171)

Marie's last name is the subject of an historical poem called Marie's Last Name (1827)

Marie Kirikatoun, a witch who promised to do a certain task for a price, in order that she might win a husband, promised the lady as her reward the witch's name for a year and a day, or submitted to any punishment she might choose to inflict. The lady was married, and forgot the witch's name, but the fair was heard singing, "Houp, houp, Marie Kirikatoun! Nobody will remember my name!" The lady, being able to tell the witch's name, was no more troubled — Fairy Queen

Griffin has a similar tale, but the name is Rumpelstiltskin, and the song was Under the millstone

Lies the Rumpelstiltskin.

Marina, daughter of Pericles prince of Tyre, born at sea, where her mother Thaisa, as it was supposed, died in giving her birth. Prince Pericles entrusted the infant to Cleon (governor of Tarsus) and his wife Dionysia, who brought her up excellently well, and she became most highly accomplished, but when grown to budding womanhood, Dionysia, out of jealousy, employed Leontine (a spy) to murder her. Leontine told Marina to the count with this intent, but the count was seized by pirates, and sold at Metchin as a slave. Here Pericles landed on his voyage from Tarsus to Tyre, and Marina was introduced to him to chase away his melancholy. She told him the story of her life, and he perceived at once that she was his daughter. Marina was now betrothed to Lysimachus, son of Metchin, but, before the parents went to visit the shrine of Diana of Ephesus, to return thanks to the goddess, and the priestess was discovered to be Thaisa the mother of Marina. — Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608)

Marina, wife of Jacopo Foscarini the doge's son — Byron, The Two Foscari (1820)

Marinda or MARINDAH, the fair concubine of Haroun al-Raschid

Marino (Le Fante), Hannah Snell of Worcester. She was present at the attack of Pondicherry. Ultimately she left the service and opened a publication-house in Wapping (London), but still retained her military attire (born 1723)

Marinel, the beloved of Hormel "the fair." Marinel was the son of black-browed Cymon (daughter of Neris and Demetrius), and allowed no one to pass by the rocky cave where he lived without doing battle with him. When Marinel forbade Britomart to pass, she replied, "I mean not thee a threat to pass," and with her spear knocked him "travelling on the ground." His mother, with the sea-nymphs, came to him, and the "six-handed Lingore," who knew leechcraft, feeling his pulse, said life was not extinct. So he was carried to his mother's bower, "deep in the bottom of the sea," where Tryphon (the sea-gods physician) soon restored him to perfect health. One day, Proteus asked Marinel and his mother to a banquet, and while the young man was sauntering about, he heard a female voice lamenting her hard lot, and saying her hardships were brought about for her love to Marinel. The young man discovered that the person was Hormel, who had been shut up in a dungeon by Proteus for rejecting his suit, so he got a warrant of release from Neptune and married her. — Spenser, Fairy Queen, iii 8, iv 11, 12 (1590, 1591)

Marini (J. B.), called Le cavalier Marin, born at Naples. He was a poet, and is known by his poem called Adonis or Adone, in twenty cantos (1623). The poem is noted for its description of the "Garden of Venus."

If the reader will, I refer over Aristotle's picture of love with Arnold (friend of the Black Prince) Just before the battle of Poitiers, thinking the English cause hopeless, Mariana induces Arnold to desert, but lord Charney will not receive him. Arnold returns to the English camp, and dies in the battle. Lord Charney is also slain, and Mariana dies distracted — Shirley, Edward the Black Prince (1610)

Mariana, the young lady that Lovegold the miser wished to marry. As Mariana was in love with the miser's son Frederick, she pretended to be extravagant and deeply in debt, which so affected the old hunk, that he gave her £2000 to be let off the bargain. Of course she assented, and married Frederick — H. Fielding, The Miser

Mariana, the daughter of a Swiss burgher, "the most beautiful of women." "Her gentleness a smile without a smile, a sweetness of look, speech, act." Leonardo being crushed by an avalanche, she nursed him through his illness, and they fell in love with each other. He started for Mantua, but was detained for two years captive by a gang of thieves, and Mariana followed him, being unable to support life where he was not. In Mantua count Florio fell in love with her, and obtained her guardian's consent to their union, but Mariana refused, was summoned before the duke (Ferrardo), and judgment was given against her. Leonardo, being present at the trial, now threw off his disguise, and was acknowledged to be the real duke. He assumed his rank, married Mariana, but being called to the camp, left Ferrardo regent. Ferrardo, being a villain, laid a cunning scheme to prove Mariana guilty of adultery with Julian St. Pierre, a countryman, but Leonardo refused to believe the charge. Julian, who turned out to be Mariana's brother, exposed the whole plot of Ferrardo, and amply cleared his sister of the slightest taint or thought of a revolt — S. Knowles, The Wife (1833)

Mariana, daughter of the king of Thessaly. She was beloved by sir Alexander, one of the three sons of St. George the patron saint of England. Sir Alexander married her, and became king of Thessaly — R. Johnson, The Seven Champions of Christendom, in 2, 3, 11 (1617)

Mariana in the Moated Grange, a young damsel who sits in the moated grange, looking out for her lover, who never comes, and the burden of her life-

song is, "My life is dreary, for he cometh not, I am awearry, and would that I were dead!"

The sequel is called Mariana in the South, in which the love-lorn maiden looks forward to her death, "when she will cease to be alone, to live forgotten, and to love forgotten" — Tennyson, Mariana (in two parts)

 Mariana, the lady betrothed to Angelo, passed her sorrowful hours "at the Moated Grange." Thus the duke says to Isabella

Haste you speedily to Angelo. I will presently to St. Ives. There at the moated grange, resides the dejected Mariana. — Shakespeare, Measure for Measure act iii. sc. 1 (1603)

Marianne (3 syl), a statuette to which the red republicans of France pay homage. It symbolizes the republic, and is arrayed in a red Phrygian cap. This statuette is sold at earthenware shops, and in republican clubs, enthroned in glory, and sometimes it is carried in procession to the tune of the Marseillaise. (See MARY ANNE)

The reason seems to be this. Ravallac, the assassin of Henri IV (the Harmodius or Anistogiton of France), was honoured by the red republicans as "patriot, deliverer, and martyr." This regicide was incited to his deed of blood by reading the celebrated treatise De Rege et Regno Institutione, by Mariana the Jesuit, published 1599 (about ten years previously). As Mariana inspired Ravallac "to deliver France from her tyrant" (Henri IV), the name was attached to the statuette of liberty, and the republican party generally.

The association of the name with the guillotine favours this suggestion.

Marianne (3 syl), the heroine of a French novel so called by Marivaux (1688-1763)

(This novel terminates abruptly, with a conclusion like that of Zadig, "where nothing is concluded")

Marianne [Franval], sister of Franval the advocate. She is a beautiful, loving, gentle creature, full of the deeds of kindness, and brimming over with charity. Marianne loves captain St. Alme, a merchant's son, and though her mother opposes the match as beneath the rank of the family, the advocate pleads for his sister, and the lovers are duly betrothed to each other — T. Holcroft, The Deaf and Dumb (1785)

Carmarthen) —Spenser, Fairy Queen, in 3 (1590)

Marie (Countess), the mother of Ulric (a love-daughter), the father of Ulrica being Ernest de Fridberg, "the prisoner of State" Marie married count D'Osborn, on condition of his obtaining the acquittal of her lover Ernest de Fridberg, but the count broke his promise, and even attempted to get the prisoner smothered in his dungeon His villainy being made known, the king ordered him to be executed, and Ernest, being set at liberty, duly married the countess Marie —L. Stirling, The Prisoner of State (1847)

Marie de Brabant, daughter of Henri III. duc de Brabant. She married Philippe le Hardi, king of France, and was accused by Labrosse of having poisoned Philippe's son by his former wife Jean de Brabant defended the queen's innocence by combat, and being the victor, Labrosse was hung (1260-1321)

Ancelet has made this the subject of an historical poem called Marie de Brabant, in six chants (1825)

Marie Kirikotoun, a witch, who promised to do a certain task for a lassie, in order that she might win a husband, provided the lassie either remembered the witch's name for a year and a day, or submitted to any punishment she might choose to inflict. The lassie was married, and forgot the witch's name, but the fay was heard singing, "Houpa, houpa, Marie Kirikotoun! Nobody will remember my name" The lassie, being able to tell the witch's name, was no more troubled —Basque Legend

Grimm has a similar tale, but the name is Rumpelstiltschen, and the song was Little dreams my dainty dame

Rumpelstiltschen is my name

Marina, daughter of Pericles prince of Tyre, born at sea, where her mother Thaisa, as it was supposed, died in giving her birth. Prince Pericles entrusted the infant to Cleon (governor of Tarsus) and his wife Dionysia, who brought her up excellently well, and she became most highly accomplished, but when grown to budding womanhood, Dionysia, out of jealousy, employed Leontine (3 syl) to murder her. Leontine took Marina to the coast with this intent, but the outcast was seized by pirates, and sold at Meteliné as a slave. Here Pericles landed on his voyage from Tarsus to Tyre, and Marina was introduced to him to chase away his melancholy. She told him the story of her life, and he perceived at once that she was his daughter. Marina was now betrothed to Lysimachus, governor of Meteliné, but, before the espousals, went to visit the shrine of Diana of Ephesus, to return thanks to the goddess, and the priestess was discovered to be Thaisa the mother of Marina —Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608)

Marina, wife of Jacopo Foscari the doge's son —Byron, The Two Foscari (1820)

Marinda or MARIDAH, the fair concubine of Haroun-al-Raschid

Marine (The Female), Hannah Snell of Worcester. She was present at the attack of Pondicherry. Ultimately she left the service, and opened a public-house in Wapping (London), but still retained her male attire (born 1723)

Marinel, the beloved of Florimel "the fair." Marinel was the son of black-browed Cimolent (daughter of Ne-reus and Damaris), and allowed no one to pass by the rocky cove where he lived without doing battle with him. When Marinel forbade Britomart to pass, she replied, "I mean not thee entreat to pass," and with her spear knocked him "groveling on the ground." His mother, with the sea-nymphs, came to him, and the "hly-handed Lagore," who knew leechcraft, feeling his pulse, said he was not extinct. So he was carried to his mother's bower, "deep in the bottom of the sea," where Triphon (the sea-god's physician) soon restored him to perfect health. One day, Proteus asked Marinel and his mother to a banquet, and while the young man was sauntering about, he heard a female voice lamenting her hard lot, and saying her hardships were brought about for her love to Marinel. The young man discovered that the person was Florimel, who had been shut up in a dungeon by Proteus for rejecting his suit, so he got a warrant of release from Neptune, and married her —Spenser, Fairy Queen, in 8, n. 11, 12 (1590, 1596)

Marini (J. B.), called Le cavalier Marin, born at Naples. He was a poet, and is known by his poem called Adonis or L'Adone, in twenty cantos (1623). The poem is noted for its description of the "Garden of Venus."

If the reader will, refer over Aristotle's picture of the garden of paradise Tasso's garden of Armida, and Marini's garden of Venus, he will be persuaded that Milton imitates their manner but excels the originals.—Thyer

Marino Faliero, the forty-ninth doge of Venice, elected 1354. A patrician named Michel Steno, having behaved indecently to some of the ladies at a great civic banquet given by the doge, was turned out of the house by order of the duke. In revenge, the young man wrote a scurrilous libel against the dogaressa, which he fastened to the doge's chair of state. The insult being referred to "the Forty," Steno was condemned to imprisonment for a month. This punishment was thought by the doge to be so inadequate to the offence, that he joined a conspiracy to overthrow the republic. The conspiracy was betrayed by Bertram, one of the members, and the doge was beheaded on the "Giant's Staircase"—Byron, Marino Faliero (1819).

* * Casimir Delavigne, in 1829, brought out a tragedy on the same subject, and with the same title.

Marion de Lorme, in whose house the conspirators met. She betrayed all their movements and designs to Richelieu.—Lord Lytton, Richelieu (1839).

Martor'nes (4 syl'), an Asturian chamber-maid at the Crescent Moon tavern, to which don Quixote was taken by his squire after their drubbing by the goat-herds. The crazy knight insisted that the tavern was a castle, and that Martor'nes, "the lord's daughter," was in love with him.

She was broad faced flat-nosed, blind of one eye and had a most delightful squint with the other, the peculiar gentility of her shape however compensated for every defect, she being about three feet in height, and remarkably hunchbacked.—Cervantes, Don Quixote I. li. 2 (1605.)

Marius (Caïus), the Roman general, tribune of the people B.C. 119, the rival of Sylla.

Antony Vincent Arnault wrote a tragedy in French entitled Marius a Minturnes (1791). Thomas Lodge, M.D., in 1594, wrote a drama called Wounds of Civil War, lately set forth in the True Tragedies of Marius and Sylla.

Mar'ivaux (Pierre de Chamblain de), a French writer of comedies and romances (1678-1763).

S. Richardson is called "The English Marivaux" (1689-1761).

Marjory of Douglas, daughter of Archibald earl of Douglas, and duchess Rothsay.—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.).

Mark (Sir), king of Cornwall, who held his court at Tintagel. He was a wily, treacherous coward, hated and despised by all true knights. One day, sir Dinadan, in jest, told him that sir Lancelot might be recognized by "his shield, which was silver with a black rim." This was, in fact, the cognizance of sir Mordred, but, to carry out the joke, sir Mordred lent it to Dagonet, king Arthur's fool. Then, mounting the jester on a large horse, and placing a huge spear in his hand, the knights sent him to offer battle to king Mark. When Dagonet beheld the coward king, he cried aloud, "Keep thee, sir knight, for I will slay thee!" King Mark, thinking it to be sir Lancelot, spurred his horse to flight. The fool gave chase, rating king Mark "as a wood man [madman]." All the knights who beheld it roared at the jest, told king Arthur, and the forest rang with their laughter. The wife of king Mark was Isoud (Ysolde) the Fair of Ireland, whose love for sir Tristram was a public scandal.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, ii. 96, 97 (1470).

Mark Tapley, a serving companion of Martin Chuzzlewit, who goes out with him to Eden, in North America. Mark Tapley thinks there is no credit in being jolly in easy circumstances, but when in Eden he found every discomfort, lost all his money, was swindled by every one, and was almost killed by fevers, then indeed he felt it would be a real credit "to be jolly under the circumstances"—C. Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1843).

Markham, a gentleman in the train of the earl of Sussex.—Sir W. Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Markham (Mrs), pseudonym of Mrs. Elizabeth Penrose (born Elizabeth Cartwright), authoress of History of England, etc.

Markleham (Mrs), the mother of Annie. Devoted to pleasure, she always maintained that she indulged in it for "Annie's sake." Mrs. Markleham is generally referred to as "the old soldier"—C. Dickens, David Copperfield (1849).

Marksman, one of Fortunio's seven attendants. He saw so clearly and to such a distance, that he generally bandaged his eyes in order to temper the great keenness of his sight.—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

Marlborough (The duke of), John Churchill. He was called by marshal Turenne, Le Bel Anglais (1650-1722) (See MALBROUGH, p. 597)

Marlow (Sir Char'es), the kind-hearted old friend of squire Hurdcastle.

Young Marlow, son of sir Charles. "Among women of reputation and virtue he is the modestest man alive, but his acquaintances give him a very different character among women of another stamp" (act 1. 1). Having mistaken Harcastle's house for an inn, and Miss Harcastle for the barmaid, he is quite at his ease, and makes love freely. When fairly caught, he discovers that the supposed "inn" is a private house, and the supposed barmaid is the squire's daughter, but the ice of his shyness being broken, he has no longer any difficulty in loving according to his station—Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer (1773).

When Goldsmith was between 16 and 17, he set out for Edgworthstown, and finding night coming on, asked a man which was the "best house" in the town—meaning the best inn. The man pointed to the house of sir Ralph Fetherstone (or Mr Fetherstone), and Oliver, entering the parlour, found the master of the mansion sitting at a good fire. Oliver told him he desired to pass the night there, and ordered him to bring in supper. "Sir Ralph" knowing his customer, humoured the joke, which Oliver did not discover till next day, when he called for his bill. (We are told in Notes and Queries that Ralph Fetherstone was only Mr, but his grandson was sir Thomas.)

Marmion. Lord Marmion was betrothed to Constance de Beverley, but he jilted her for lady Clare an heiress, who was in love with Ralph de Wilton. The lady Clare rejected lord Marmion's suit, and took refuge from him in the convent of St Hilda, in Whitby. Constance took the veil in the convent of St Cuthbert, in Holy Isle, but after a time left the convent clandestinely, was captured, taken back, and buried alive in the walls of a deep cell. In the mean time, lord Marmion, being sent by Henry VIII on an embassy to James IV of Scotland, stopped at the hall of sir Hugh de Heron, who sent a palmer as his guide. On his return, lord Marmion commanded the abbess of St Hilda to release the lady Clare, and place her under the charge of her kinsman, Fitzclare of Tantallon Hall.

Here she met the palmer, who was Ralph de Wilton, and as lord Marmion was slain in the battle of Flodden Field, she was free to marry the man she loved—Sir W. Scott, Marmion (1808).

Marmion (Lord), a descendant of Robert de Marmion, who obtained from William the Conqueror the manor of Serivelby, in Lincolnshire. This Robert de Marmion was the first royal champion of England, and the office remained in the family till the reign of Edward I, when in default of male issue it passed to John Dymoke, son-in-law of Philip Marmion, in whose family it remains still.

Ma'ro, Virgil, whose full name was Publius Virgilius Maro (b c 70-19).

Mar'onites (3 syl), a religious semi-Catholic sect of Syria, constantly at war with their near neighbours the Druses, a semi-Mohammedan sect. Both are now tributaries of the sultan, but enjoy their own laws. The Maronites number about 400,000, and the Druses about half that number. The Maronites owe their name to J Maron, their founder, the Druses to Durzi, who led them out of Egypt into Syria. The patriarch of the Maronites resides at Kanobin, the hakem of the Druses at Dair-el-kamar. The Maronites or "Catholics of Lebanon" differ from the Poman Catholics in several points, and have a pope or patriarch of their own. In 1860 the Druses made on them a horrible onslaught, which called forth the intervention of Europe.

Marotte (2 syl), footman of Gorgibus, a plain bourgeois, who hates affection. When the fine ladies of the house try to convert him into a fashionable flunky, and teach him a little grand-eloquence, he bluntly tells them he does not understand Latin.

Marotte. Voilà un laquais qui demande si vous êtes au logis, et dit que son maître, vous venir voir.
Madelon. Apprenez, sottise à vous enoncer moins vulgairement. Dites. Voilà un nécessaire qui demande si vous êtes en commodité d'être visité.

Marotte. Je n'entends point le Latin.—Molière, Les Précieuses Ridicules VII (1659).

Marphisa, sister of Rogero, and a female knight of amazing prowess. She was brought up by a magician, but being stolen at the age of seven was sold to the king of Persia. When she was 16, her royal master assailed her honour, but she slew him, and usurped the crown Marphusa went to Gaul to join the army of Agrimant, but subsequently entered the camp of Charlemagne, and was baptized—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Marphurius, a doctor of the Pyrrhonian school Sganarelle consults him about his marriage, but the philosopher replies, "Perhaps, it is possible, it may be so, everything is doubtful," till at last Sganarelle beats him, and Marphurius says he shall bring an action against him for battery "Perhaps," replies Sganarelle, "it is possible, it may be so," etc, using the very words of the philosopher (see ix)—Molière, Le Mariage Forcé (1664)

Marplot, "the busy body" A blundering, good-natured, meddlesome young man, very inquisitive, too officious by half, and always bungling whatever he interferes in Marplot is introduced by Mrs Centlivre in two comedies, The Busy Body and Marplot in Lisbon

That unlucky dog Marplot Is ever doing mischief and yet (to give him his due) he never designs it This is some blundering adventure wherein he thought to show his friendship as he calls it—Mrs Centlivre The Busy Body III 5 (1709)

* * This was Henry Woodward's great part (1717-1777) His unappeasable curiosity, his slow comprehension, his annihilation under the sense of his dilemmas, were so diverting, that even Garrick confessed him the decided "Marplot" of the stage—Boden, Life of Siddons

N B—William Cavendish duke of Newcastle brought out a free translation of Molière's L'Etourdi, which he entitled Marplot

Marquis de Basqueville, being one night at the opera, was told by a messenger that his mansion was on fire "Oh bien," he said to the messenger, "adrezsez-vous à Mme la marquise qui est en face dans cette loge, car c'est affaire de ménage"—Chapus, Dieppe et ses Environs (1853)

Marrall (Jack), a mean-spirited, revengeful time-server He is the clerk and tool of sir Giles Overreach When Marrall thinks Wellborn penniless, he treats him like a dog, but immediately he fancies he is about to marry the wealthy dowager lady Allworth, he is most servile, and offers to lend him money Marrall now plays the traitor to a master, sir Giles, and reveals to

Wellborn the senny tricks by which he has been cheated of his estates When, however, he asks Wellborn to take him into his service, Wellborn replies, "He who is false to one master will betray another," and will have nothing to say to him—Massinger, A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1628)

Married Men of Genius The number of men of genius unhappy in their wives is very large The following are notorious examples—Socrates and Xantippé, Sadi the Persian poet, Danté and Gemma Donati, Milton with two of his wives, Marlborough and Sarah Jennings, Gustavus Adolphus and his flighty queen, Byron and Miss Milbanke, Dickens and Miss Hogarth, Whitfield and Mrs James, J. Wesley, etc

Mars of Portugal (The), Alfonso de Albuquerque, viceroy of India (1452-1515)

Mars Wounded. A very remarkable parallel to the encounter of Diomed and Mars in the Iliad, v, occurs in Ossian Homer says that Diomed hurled his spear against Mars, which, piercing the belt, wounded the war-god in the bowels "Loud bellowed Mars, nine thousand men, ten thousand, scarce so loud joining fierce battle" Then Mars ascending, wrapped in clouds, was borne upwards to Olympus

Ossian, in Carric-Thura, says that Loda, the god of his foes, came like "a blast from the mountain He came in his terror, and shook his dusky spear His eyes were flames, and his voice like distant thunder 'Son of night,' said Fingal, 'retire Do I fear thy gloomy form, spirit of dismal Loda? Weak is thy shield of cloud, feeble thy meteor sword'" Then cleft he the gloomy shadow with his sword It fell like a column of smoke It shrieked. Then, rolung itself up, the wounded spirit rose on the wind, and the island shook to its foundation

Martyr King (The), Charles I of England (1600, 1625-1649)

Louis XVI of France is also called Louis "the Martyr" (1754, 1773-1793)

Martyrs to Science

Claude Louis count Berthollet, who tested on himself the effects of carbonic acid on the human frame, and died under the experiment (1748-1822)

Giordano Bruno, who was burnt alive for maintaining that matter is the mother of all things (1550-1600)

Galileo, who was imprisoned twice by the Inquisition for maintaining that the earth moved round the sun and not the sun round the earth (1564-1642)

And scores of others

Marvellous Boy (The), Thomas Chatterton (1752-1770)

I thought a Chatterton, the marvellous boy
The sleepiest soul that perished in his pride.

Wordsworth.

Marwood (Alice), daughter of an old woman who called herself Mrs Brown When a mere girl, she was concerned in a burglary and was transported Carker, manager in the firm of Dombey and Son, seduced her, and both she and her mother determined on revenge Alice bore a striking resemblance to Edith (Mr Dombey's second wife), and in fact they were cousins, for Mrs Brown was "wife" of the brother-in-law of the Hon. Mr.

Skewton (Edith's mother) —C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Marwood (Mistress), jilted by Fainall and sonred against the whole male sex. She says, "I have done hating those vipers—men, and am now come to despise them," but she thinks of marrying, to keep her husband "on the rack of fear and jealousy." —W Congreve, The Way of the World (1700)

Mary, the pretty housemaid of the worshipful the mayor of Ipswich (Nuptials) When Arabella Allen marries Mr Winkle, Mary enters her service, but eventually marries Sam Weller, and lives at Dulwich as Mr Pickwick's housekeeper —C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Mary The queen's Marys, four young ladies of quality, of the same age as Mary after wards "queen of Scots" They embarked with her in 1548, on board the French galleys, and were destined to be her playmates in childhood, and her companions when she grew up Their names were Mary Beaton (or Bethune), Mary Livingston (or Leison), Mary Fleming (or Fleming), and Mary Seaton (or Ston or Seyton)

* * Mary Carmichael has no place in authentic history, although an old ballad says

Yesterday the green had four Marys
This night she'll have but three
There was Mary Leaton and Mary Seaton,
And Mary Carmichael and me

* * One of Whyte Melville's novels is called The Queen's Marys

Mary Anne, a slang name for the guillotine, also called L'abbaye de montagne-à-regret ("the mountain of mournful ascent") (See MARIANNE)

Mary Anne, a generic name for a secret republican society in France (See MARIANNE) —B Disraeli, Lothair

Mary Anne was the red name for the republic years ago and there always was a sort of myth that these secret societies had been founded by a woman The Mary Anne associations which are essentially republic, are scattered about all the provinces of France —Lothair

Mary Graham, an orphan adopted by old Martin Chuzzlewit She eventually married Martin Chuzzlewit the grandson, and hero of the tale

The young girl said the old man 'Is an orphan child, whom I have bred and educated, or, if you prefer the word, adopted. For a year or two she has been my companion and she is my only one. I have taken a solemn oath not to leave her a sixpence when I die but while I live I make her an annual allowance not extravagant in its amount, and yet not stinted."—C. Dickens Martin Chuzzlewit III. (1843)

Mary Stuart, an historical tragedy, by J. Haynes (1840) The subject is the death of David Rizzio

* * Schiller has taken Mary Stuart for the subject of a tragedy. P. Lebrun turned the German drama into a French play. Sir W. Scott, in The Abbot, has taken for his subject the flight of Mary to England

Mary Tudor Victor Hugo has a tragedy so called (1833), and Tennyson, in 1878, issued a play entitled Queen Mary, an epitome of the reign of the Tudor Mary

Mary and Byron The "Mary" of lord Byron was Miss Chaworth. Both were under the guardianship of Mr. White. Miss Chaworth married John Musters and lord Byron married Miss Milbanke, both equally unfortunate. Lord Byron, in The Dream, refers to his love affair with Mary Chaworth. (See p. 145)

Mary in Heaven, Highland Mary, and Mary Morrison The first of these refers to Mary Campbell, who died 1786, aged 37, ten years older than Burns. The other two refer to Mary Morrison, who died young, and to whom Burns was attached before he left Ayrshire for Nithsdale. The two lines in Mary Morrison—

Those smiles and glances let me see,
That make the miser's treasure poor resemble the two following in Highland Mary

Still o'er those scenes my memory wakes,
And fondly broods with miser care

* * She is introduced by Sir W. Scott in his novel entitled The Abbot

Schiller has taken Mary Stuart for the subject of his best tragedy, and P. Lebrun brought out in France a French version thereof (1729-1807)

Mary queen of Scots The most elegant and poetical compliment ever paid to a woman was paid to Mary queen of Scots, by Shakespeare, in Midsummer Night's Dream. Remember, the mermaid is "queen Mary," the dolphin means the "dauphin of France," whom Mary married, the rude sea means the "Scotch rebels," and the stars that shot from their spheres means "the princes who sprang from their allegiance to queen Elizabeth"

Thou rememberst
Since once I sat upon a promontory to near the sea maid's music.

Act II. sc. 1. (1.32)

These "stars" were the earl of Northumberland, the earl of Westmorland, and the duke of Norfolk

Mary the Maid of the Inn, the delight and sunshine of the parish, about to be married to Richard, an idle, worthless fellow. One autumn night, two guests were drinking at the inn, and one remarked he should not much like to go to the abbey on such a night. "I'll wager that Mary will go," said the other, and the bet was accepted. Mary went, and, hearing footsteps, stepped into a place of concealment, when presently passed her two men carrying a young woman they had just murdered. The hat of one blew off, and fell at Mary's feet. She picked it up, flew to the inn, told her story, and then, producing the hat, found it was Richard's. Her senses gave way, and she became a confirmed maniac for life.—R. Sonther, Mary the Maid of the Inn (from Dr Plot's History of Staffordshire, 1686)

Mar'zavan, foster-brother of the princess Badour'a.—Arabian Nights ("Camaralzaman and Badoura")

Masanello, a corruption of [Tom]-mas Anello, a Neapolitan fisherman, who headed an insurrection in 1647 against the duke of Arcos, and he resolved to kill the duke's son for having seduced Fenella his sister, who was deaf and dumb. The insurrection succeeded, and Masanello was elected by his rabble "chief magistrate of Portici," but he became intoxicated with his greatness, so the mob shot him, and flung his dead body into a ditch. Next day, however, it is taken out and interred with much ceremony and pomp. When Icella heard of her brother's death, she threw herself into the crater of Vesuvius.

* * Auber has an opera on the subject (1831), the libretto by Scribe. Caraffa had chosen the same subject for an opera previously.

Mascarille (3 syl), the valet of La Grange. In order to reform two silly, romantic girls, La Grange and Du Croix, introduce to them their valets, as the "marquis of Mascarille" and the "viscount of Jodelet." The girls are taken with their "aristocratic visitors," but when the game has gone far enough, the masters enter and unmask the trick. By this means the girls are taught a most useful lesson, and are saved from any serious ill consequences.—Moliere, Les Précieuses Ridicules (1659).

* * Moliere had already introduced the same name in two other of his comedies, Il tourdu (1653) and Le Dépit Amoureux (1654).

Masetto, a rustic engaged to Zerlina, but don Giovanni interferences before the wedding, and deludes the foolish girl into believing that he means to make her a great lady and his wife.—Mozart, Don Giovanni (libretto by L. da Ponte, 1787).

Maskwell, the "double dealer." He pretends to love lady Touchwood, but it is only to make her a tool for breaking the attachment between Mellefont (2 syl) and Cynthia. Maskwell pretends friendship for Mellefont merely to throw dust in his eyes respecting his designs to carry off Cynthia, to whom Mellefont is betrothed. Cunning and hypocrisy are Maskwell's substitutes for wisdom and honesty.—W. Congreve, The Double Dealer (1700).

Mason (William). The medallion to this poet in Westminster Abbey was by Bacon.

Mast (The Tallest). The mainmast of the Merry Dism of Dover was so tall "that the boy who climbed it would be grey with extreme age before he could reach deck again"—Scandinavian Mythology.

Master (The). Goethe is called Der Master (1749-1832).

I beseech you, Mr. Tiddler, not to be so sarcastic on the Master.—Doctor Ambrosius.

May Queen (The), a poem in three parts by Tennyson (1842). Alee, a bright-eyed, merry child, was chosen May queen, and, being afraid she might oversleep herself, told her mother to be sure to call her early.

I sleep so sound all night, mother that I shall never wake

If you do not call me loud when the day begins to break.
 But I must gather knots of flowers, and buds and garlands gay
 For I'm to be queen o the May mother I'm to be queen o the May

The old year passed away, and the black-eyed, rustic maiden was dying. She hoped to greet the new year before her eyes, closed in death, and bade her mother once again to be sure to call her early, but it was not now because she slept so soundly. Alas! no

Good night sweet mother call me before the day is born
 All night I lie awake but I fall asleep at morn;

But I would see the sun rise upon the glad New Year
 So if you're waking call me, call me early mother dear

The day rose and passed away, but Alee lingered on till March. The snowdrops had gone before her, and the violets were in bloom. Robin had dearly loved the child, but the thoughtless village beauty, in her joyous girlhood, tossed her head at him, and never thought of love, but now that she was going to the land of shadows, her dying words were

And say to Robin a kind word, and tell him not to fret
 There's many worthier than I would make him happy yet.

If I had lived—I cannot tell—I might have been his wife;
 But all these things have ceased to be with my desire of life.

Maye (The), that subtle and abstruse sense which the goddess Maja inspires Plato, Epicharmos, and some other ancient philosophers refer it to the presence of divinity. "It is the divinity which stirs within us." In poetry it gives an inner sense to the outward word, and in common minds it degenerates into delusion or second sight. Maye is an Indian deity, and personates the "power of creation."

 number of French romances and caricatures.

Mayflower, a ship of 180 tons, which, in December, 1620, started from Plymouth, and conveyed to Massachusetts, in North America, 102 puritans, called the "Pilgrim Fathers," who named their settlement New Plymouth.

the Mayflower sailed from the harbour [Plymouth].
 Took the wind on her quarter and stood for the open Atlantic, Borne on the end of the sea, and the swelling hearts of the pilgrims.

Maylie (Mrs), the lady of the house attacked burglariously by Bill Sikes and others. Mrs Maylie is mother of Harry Maylie, and aunt of Rose Fleming who lives with her.

She was well advanced in years but the high backed oaken chair in which she sat was not more upright than

she. Dressed with the utmost nicety and precision in a quaint mixture of bygone costume with some slight concessions to the prevailing taste which rather served to point the old style pleasantly than to impair its effect she sat in a stately manner with her hands folded before her —Ch xxix.

Harry Maylie, Mrs Maylie's son He marries his cousin Rose Fleming —C Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Mayor of Garratt (The) Garratt is between Wandsworth and Tooting The first mayor of this village was elected towards the close of the eighteenth century, and the election came about thus Garratt Common had often been encroached on, and in 1780 the inhabitants associated themselves together to defend their rights The chairman was called Mayor, and as it happened to be the time of a general election, the society made it a law that a new "mayor" should be elected at every general election The addresses of these mayors, written by Foote, Garrick, Wilks, and others, are satires and political squibs The first mayor of Garratt was "sir" John Harper, a retailer of brickdust, and the last was "sir" Harry Dimsdale, a muffin-seller (1796) In Foote's farce so called, Jerry Sneak is chosen mayor, son-in-law of the landlord (1763)

Mazeppa (Jan), a hetman of the Cossacks, born of a noble Polish family in Podolia He was a page in the court of Jan Casimir king of Poland, and while in this capacity intrigued with Theresia the young wife of a Podolian count, who discovered the amour, and had the young page lashed to a wild horse, and turned adrift The horse rushed in mad fury, and dropped down dead in the Ukraine, where Mazeppa was released by a Cossack, who nursed him carefully in his own hut In time the young page became a prince of the Ukraine, but fought against Russia in the battle of Poltowa Lord Byron (1819) makes Mazeppa tell his tale to Charles XII after the battle (1640-1709)

Mister Pichardson had a fine appreciation of genius, and left the original "Mazeppa" at Astley's a handsome legacy [1,65-1836].—Mark Lemon.

M. B. Waistcoat, a clerical waistcoat M B means "Mark [of the] Beast," so called because, when these waistcoats were first worn by protestant clergymen (about 1830), they were stigmatized as indicating a popish tendency

He smiled at the folly which stigmatized an M B. waistcoat —Mrs. Oliphant, Phoebe Jun II. 2.

Meadows (Sir William), a kind country gentleman, the friend of Jack Luttrell and father of young Meadows

Young Meadows left his father's home because the old gentleman wanted him to marry Rosetta, whom he had never seen He called himself Thomas, and entered the service of justice Woodcock as gardener Here he fell in love with the supposed chamber-maid, who proved to be Rosetta, and their marriage fulfilled the desire of all the parties interested —J Bickerstaff, Love in a Village

Charles Dignum made his debut at Drury Lane in 1784 in the character of "Young Meadows." His voice was so clear and full toned and his manner of singing so judicious, that he was received with the warmest applause —Dictionary of Musicians.

Meagles (Mr), an eminently "practical man," who, being well off, travelled over the world for pleasure His party consisted of himself, his daughter Pet, and his daughter's servant called Tattycoram. A jolly man was Mr Meagles, but clear-headed, shrewd, and persevering.

Mrs Meagles, wife of the "practical man," and mother of Pet—C Dickens, Little Dorrit (1857)

Meal-Tub Plot, a fictitious conspiracy concocted by Dangerfield for the purpose of cutting off those who opposed the succession of James duke of York, afterwards James II. The scheme was concealed in a meal-tub in the house of Mrs Cellier (1685)

Measure for Measure. There was a law in Vienna that made it death for a man to live with a woman not his wife, but the law was so little enforced that the mothers of Vienna complained to the duke of its neglect. So the duke deputed Angelo to enforce it, and, assuming the dress of a friar, absented himself awhile, to watch the result. Scarcely was the duke gone, when Claudio was sentenced to death for violating the law. His sister Isabel went to intercede on his behalf, and Angelo told her he would spare her brother if she would become his Phryne. Isabel told her brother he must prepare to die, as the conditions proposed by Angelo were out of the question. The duke, disguised as a friar, heard the whole story, and persuaded Isabel to "assent in words," but to send Mariana (the divorced "wife" of Angelo) to take her place. This was done, but Angelo sent the provost to behold Claudio, a crime which "the friar" contrived to avert. Next day, the duke returned to the city, and Isabel told her tale. The end was, the duke married Isabel, Angelo took back his wife, and Claudio married Isabel whom he had rescued—Shakespeare Measure for Measure (1603) (See MARIANA, p. 611)

* * * This story is from Whetstone's comedy of Promos and Cassandra (1578). A similar story is given also in Giraldi Cinthio's third decade of stories.

Medam'othi, the island at which the fleet of Pantagruel landed on the fourth day of their voyage. Here many choice curiosities were bought, such as "the picture of a man's voice," an "echo drawn to life," "Plato's ideas," some of "Epicurus's atoms," a sample of "Philon's needlework," and other objects of virtue to be obtained nowhere else—Rabelais, Pantagruel, iv. 3 (1515).

* * * Medimotha is a compound Greek word, meaning "never in any place." So Utopia is a Greek compound, meaning "no place," Ker nagislar is a Scotch compound, meaning "I know not where," and Kennahli har is Anglo-Saxon for the same. All these places are in 91° north lat. and 180° 1' west long., in the North Ocean.

Medea, a famous sorceress of Colchis, who married Jason the leader of the Argonauts, and aided him in getting possession of the Golden Fleece. After being married ten years, Jason repudiated her for Glauce, and Medea, in revenge, sent the bride a poisoned robe, which killed both Glauce and her father. Medea then tore to pieces her two sons, and fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by dragons.

The story has been dramatized in Greek, by Euripides; in Latin, by Seneca; and by Ovid, in French, by Corneille (Medea, 1635), Longepierre (1695), and Lagouze (1814), in English, by Glover (1761).

Mrs. A. M. W. B. (1814) Medea.—Thomas Campbell.

Medea and Absyrtus. When Medea fled with Jason from Colchis (in Asia), she murdered her brother Absyrtus, and, cutting the body into several pieces, strewed the fragments about, that the father might be delayed in picking them up, and thus be unable to overtake the fugitives.

Meet I am to cut of the duke of York
Into as many pieces as I can cut it
As wild Medea young Absyrtus did Shakespeare Henry VI. Act v. s. 2 (171)

Medea's Kettle. Medea the sorceress cut to pieces an old man, threw the parts into her caldron, and by her incantations changed the old man into a young lamb. The daughters of Pelas thought they would have their father restored to youth, as Jason had been. So they killed him, and put the body in Medea's caldron, but Medea refused to utter the needful incantation, and so the old man was not restored to life (See MARIANA).

Change the shape and shake off age—Get thee Medea's kettle and be boiled anew—W. Longev. Love for Love, iv. (1714)

Midecin Malgre Lui (Je), a comedy by Molière (1666). The "enforced doctor" is Sganarelle, a faggot-maker, who is called in by Cronto to cure his daughter of dumbness. Sganarelle perceives that the malady is assumed in order to prevent a hateful marriage, and introduces her lover as an apothecary. The dumb spirit is at once exorcised, and the lover, made happy with "pills matrimonial."

In 1833 Fielding produced a farce called The Mock Doctor, which was based on this comedy. The doctor he calls "Gregory," and Géronte "sir Jasper" Lncinde, the dumb girl, he calls "Charlotte," and Anglicizes her lover Leandre into "Leander."

Medham ("the leen"), one of Mahomet's swords

Medicine So the alchemists called the matter (whatever it might be) by which they performed their transformations as, for example, the "philosopher's stone," which was to transmute whatever it touched into gold, "the elixir of life," which was to renew old age to youth

How much unlike art thou, Mark Antony!
Yet, coming from him, that great medicine hath
With his line gilded thee
Shakespeare Antony and Cleopatra Act I, sc 5 (1608)

Medicine (The Father of), Aesculapius of Cypriodora (second and third centuries)

Medi'oy (Matthew), the factotum of sir Walter Waring He marries Dolly, daughter of Goodman Fairlop the woodman —Sir H P Dudley, The Woodman (1771)

Medo'ra, the beloved wife of Conrad the corsair When Conrad was taken captive by the pacha Seyd, Medora sat day after day expecting his return, and feeling the heart-anguish of hope deferred. Still he returned not, and Medora died. In the mean time, Gulnare, the favourite concubine of Seyd, murdered the pacha, liberated Conrad, and sailed with him to the corsair's island home. When, however, Conrad found his wife dead, he quitted the island, and went no one knew whither. The sequel of the story forms the poem called Lara —Byron, The Corsair (1814)

Medo'ro, a Moorish youth of extraordinary beauty, but of humble race, page to Agramante. Being wounded, Angelica dressed his wounds, fell in love with him, married him, and retired with him to Cathay, where, in sight of his wife, he became king. This was the cause of Orlando's madness —Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

When don Faldan (Orlando) discovered in a fountain proofs of Angelica's dishonourable conduct with Medoro it distracted him to such a degree that he tore up his trees by the roots, sullied the purest streams, destroyed flocks, slew shepherds, fired their huts, pulled houses to the ground, and committed a thousand other most furious exploits worthy of being reported in famous register —Cervantes, Don Quixote L III II (1605)

Medulla Theologiae, a controversial treatise by William Ames (1623)

Medulla Theologica, a theological work by Louis Abell bishop of Rhodes (1601-1691) It is alluded to by Boileau, in the Lutrin, IV (1683)

Meg Murdochson, an old gipsy thief, mother of Madge Wildfire —Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Megid'don, the tutelary angel of Simon the Canaanite. This Simon, "once a shepherd, was called by Jesus from the field, and feasted Him in his hut with a lamb" —Klopstock, The Messiah, III (1748)

Megingard, the belt of Thor, whereby his strength was doubled

Megissog'won ("the great pearl-feather"), a magician, and the Manito of wealth. It was Megissogwon who sent the fiery fever on man, the white fog, and death. Hiawatha slew him, and taught man the science of medicine. This great Pearl-feather slew the father of Niko'mis (the grandmother of Hiawatha). Hiawatha all day long fought with the magician without effect, at night fall the woodpecker told him to strike at the tuft of hair on the magician's head, the only vulnerable place, accordingly, Hiawatha discharged his three remaining arrows at the hair tuft, and Megiasogwon died.

It never be to Hiawatha
He is the great Pearl-feather
Slew the father of Niko'mis—
Him that sent the Pigeon
Sent dove and death among men
To slay the magician, he. (1870)

Moldewham (Mr. Sumlers), "the man of law," in the managing committee of the Spa hotel—Sir W. Scott, St. Julian's Well (time, George III.).

Meister (Wilhelm), the hero and title of a novel by Goethe. The object is to show that man, despite his errors and shortcomings, is led by a guiding hand, and reaches some higher aim at last (1821).

Meistersingers, or minstrel tradesmen of Germany. An association of master tradesmen, to revive the national minstrelsy, which had fallen into decay with the decline of the minnesingers or love-minstrels (1350-1524). Their subjects were chiefly moral or religious, and constructed according to rigid rules. The three chief were Hans Rosenblatt (armorial painter, born 1450), Hans Folz (surgeon, born 1479), and Hans Sachs (cobbler, 1491-1571). The next best were Heinrich von Muehlen, Konrad Harder, Master Altschuler, Master Barthel Regenbogen (the blacksmith), Muscablüt (the tailor), and Hans Blotz (the barber).

Mey'noun and Leilah (2 syl.), a Persian love tale, the Romeo and Juliet of Eastern romance. They are the most beautiful, chaste, and impassionate of lovers, the models of what lovers would be if human nature were perfect.

When he sang the loves of Meyn and Leilah
Tears lay on his cheek, and the cheeks of his fair
—W. Lockhart, Fairfax (1793).

Melan'chates (1 syl.), the hound that killed Actron, and was changed into a hart.

Melan'chates the hound
That killed Actron to the ground
Gave him a mortal wound
Was changed to a hart
—Shelton's Philby & more (time, Henry VIII.).

Melantius, a rough, honest soldier, who believes every one is true till convicted of crime, and then is he a relentless punisher. Melantius and Uphilus are brothers of Lucius—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Maid's Tragedy (1610).

* * The master scene between Antony and Ventidius in Dryden's All for Love is copied from The Maid's Tragedy. "Ventidius" is in the place of Melantius.

Melchior, one of the three kings of Cologne. He was the "Wise Man of the East" who offered to the infant Jesus gold, the emblem of royalty. The other two were Gaspar and Balthazar. Melchior means "king of light."

Mel'chor, a monk attending the black priest of St. Paul's—Sir W. Scott, Annals of Guic'bert (time, Edward IV.).

Melchor (i.e. Melchior Pfingst), a German poet who wrote the Leisdrang, an epic poem which has the hero Maximilian (son of Frederick III.) for its hero. This poem was the Orlando Furioso of the Germans.

But the poet Melchior singing later Maximilian's praise
Laid follow—Meister's

Melon'gor, son of Althra, who was doomed to live while a certain log remained unconsumed. Althra kept the log for several years, but being one day angry with her son, she cast it on the fire, where it was consumed. Her son died at the same moment—Ovid, Metam., viii. 1.

Sir John Davies uses this to illustrate the immortality of the soul. He says that the life of the soul does not depend on the body, as Melenger's life depended on the fatal brand.

Again, if by the body's prop she stand—
If on the body's life her life depend,
As Melenger's on the fatal brand
The body's good she only would intend —Johnson, III. (1634).

Meliadus, father of sir Tristan, prince of Lyonesse, and one of the heroes of Arthurian romance — Tristan de Leonis (1489)

* * Tristan, in the History of Prince Arthur, compiled by sir T. Malory (1470), is called "Tristram," but the old minne-singers of Germany (twelfth century) called the name "Tristan"

Melibe (3 syl'), a rich young man married to Prudens. One day, when Melibé was in the fields, some enemies broke into his house, beat his wife, and wounded his daughter Sophie in her feet, hands, ears, nose, and mouth. Melibé was furious and vowed vengeance, but Prudens persuaded him "to forgive his enemies, and to do good to those who spitefully used him." So he called together his enemies, and forgave them, to the end that "God of his endeles mereie wole at the tyme of oure deyinge forgive us oure giltes that we have trespassed to Him in this wretched world" — Chaucer, Canterbury Tales (1388)

* * This prose tale is a literal translation of a French story — See MS Reg, vol. 7, and MS Reg, vol. 11, British Museum

Melibee, a shepherd, and the reputed father of Pastorella. Pastorella married sir Calidore — Spenser, Fairy Queen, vol. 9 (1596)

"Melibee" is sir Francis Walsingham. In the Runs of Time, Spenser calls him "Melibæ." Sir Philip Sidney (the "sir Calidore" of the Fairy Queen) married his daughter Frances. Sir Francis Walsingham died in 1590, so poor that he did not leave enough to defray his funeral expenses

Melibæ'an Dye, a rich purple. So called because Melibæa of Thessaly was famous for the ostrum, a fish used in dying purple

Mell (Mr) held his court in the Tower of Chivalry, and then knighted Grumble Amore after giving him the following advice —

As I have said, of a knight's profession
Habit and of a knight's profession
Gave me a habit of a knight's profession
Fought a knight of a knight's profession
Fought a knight of a knight's profession
Fought a knight of a knight's profession
Fought a knight of a knight's profession
Fought a knight of a knight's profession

Mell (Mr) the poor, down trodden second master at Salem House, the school of Mr Crabbles. Mr Mell played the flute. His mother lived in an old house, and Steerforth used to taunt Mell with this "degradation," and in the end sent him to be discharged. Mell emigrated to Australia, and succeeded well in the new country — C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Mellefont (2nd), in love with Cecilia daughter of Sir Paul Peverell. His aunt, Lady Touchwood, had a natural fondness for him, and because he repelled her affection she vowed his ruin. After passing several hair-breadth escapes from the "double dagger" of his aunt and his "friend" Maskell, he succeeded in winning and marrying the lady of his attachment — W Congreve, The Double Dealer (1709)

Mellifluous Doctor (77), a Perverd, whose writings were called "a river of paradise" (1691-1753)

Melnotte (Claude), a gardeners son, in love with Pauline "the Beauty of France," but treated by her with contempt. Beaumont and Glauve, two other rejected suitors conspired with him to humble the proud fair one. To this end, Claude assumed to be the prince of Como, and Pauline married him, but was and snapt when she discovered now she had been duped. Claude left her to join the French army, and, under the name of Mornar, rose in two years and a half to the rank of colonel. He then returned to Lyons, and found his father-in-law on the eve of bankruptcy, and Pauline about to be sold to her agent to pay the creditors. Claude paid the money required, and eluded Pauline as his loving and truthful wife — Lord L B Lytton, Lady of Lyons (1838)

Melo (Jern de), born at Castile in the fifteenth century. A dispute having arisen at Barcelona upon the question whether Achilles or Hector were the braver warrior, the marquis de Villetra called out, "Let us see if the advocates of Achilles can fight as well as fight." At the word, there appeared in the assembly a gigantic fire-breathing monster, which repeated the same challenge. Every one shrink back except Juan de Melo, who drew his sword and placed himself before king Juan II to protect him, "till life, till death." The king, rewarded him with the Alcázar de Peñís, in Granada, for his loyalty — Cervantes de la historia de la

Melrose (1st), an heir who married Charles Middleton. This was a man of the count of his father, because Violet had the bad taste to snub the retired tradesman, and considered vulgar as the "unpardonable sin."

Mary Melrose, Violet's cousin, but without a penny. She married Talbot Champness, but his father, Sir Geoffrey, wanted him to marry Violet the heiress — H J Byron, Our Dogs (a comedy, 1875)

Melusi'na, the most famous of the fées of France. Having enclosed her father in a mountain for offending her mother, she was condemned to become a serpent every Saturday. When she married the count of Daigmen, she made her husband swear never to visit her on that day, but the jealousy of the count drove him break his vow. Melusi'na was, in consequence, obliged to leave her mortal husband, and roam about the world as a ghost till the day of doom. Some say the count immured her in the dungeon wall of his castle — Jean d'Arras (fourteenth century)

"* The cry of despair given by the fées when she discovered the indiscreet visit of her husband, is the origin of the phrase, Un cri de Melusi'ne ("A shriek of despair").

Melvill (Sir John), a young baronet, engaged to be married to Miss Sterling, the elder daughter of a City merchant, who promises to settle on her £80,000.

A little before the marriage, sir John finds that he has no regard for Miss Sterling, but a great love for her younger sister Fanny, to whom he makes a proposal of marriage. His proposal is rejected, and it is soon brought to light that Miss Fanny has been clandestinely married to Lovewell for four months—Colman and Garriek, The Clandestine Marriage (1766)

Memnon, king of the Ethiopians. He went to the assistance of his uncle Priam, and was slain by Achilles. His mother Los, inconsolable at his death, weeps for him every morning, and her tears constitute what we call dew.

Memnon, the black statue of king Amenophis III at Thebes, in Egypt, which, being struck with the rays of the morning sun, gives out musical sounds. Kircher says these sounds are due to a sort of clavecin or Æolian harp enclosed in the statue, the cords of which are acted upon by the warmth of the sun. Cambyse, resolved to learn the secret, cleft the statue from head to waist, but it continued to utter its morning melody notwithstanding.

Memorable (The Ever-), John Hales of Eton (1584-1656)

Memory The persons most noted for their memory are

Maghabechi of Florence, called "The Universal Index and Living Cyclopædia" (1633-1714)

P J Beromeius, the Greek and Latin improvisator, who knew by heart Horace, Virgil, Cicero, Juvenal, both the Plinys, Homer, and Aristophanes. He died at Middleburgh, in 1676

Andrew Fuller, after hearing 500 lines twice, could repeat them without a mistake. He could also repeat verbatim a sermon or speech, could tell either backwards or forwards every shop sign from the Temple to the extreme end of Cheap-side, and the articles displayed in each of the shops

"Memory" Woodfall could carry in his head a debate, and repeat it a fortnight afterwards

"Memory" Thompson could repeat the names, trades, and particulars of every shop from Ludgate Hill to Piccadilly

William Radcliff, the husband of the novelist, could repeat a debate the next morning

Memory (The Bard of), Samuel Rogers, author of the Pleasures of Memory (1762-1855)

Men are but Children of a Larger Growth—Dryden, All for Love, etc., iv 1 (1678)

Men of Prester John's Country Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnenus, says his land is the home of men with horns, of one-eyed men (the eye being in some cases before the head, and in some cases behind it), of giants forty ells in height (i.e. 120 feet), of the phœnix, etc., and of ghouls who feed on premature children. He gives the names of fifteen different tributary states, amongst which are those of Gog and Magog (now shut in behind lofty mountains), but at the end of the world these fifteen states will overrun the whole earth

Menalcaas, any shepherd or rustic. The name occurs in the Idylls of Theocritos, the Ecloques of Virgil, and the Shepherd's Calendar of Spenser

Men'cia of Mosquera (Donna) married don Alvaro de Mello. A few days after the marriage, Alvaro happened to quarrel with don Andrea de Baes and kill him. He was obliged to flee from Spain, leaving his bride behind, and his property was confiscated. For seven years she received no intelligence of his whereabouts (for he was a slave most of the time), but when seven years had elapsed the report of his death in Iz reached her. The young widow now married the marquis of Guardia, who lived in a grand castle near Burgos, but walking in the grounds one morning she was struck with the earnestness with which one of the under-gardeners looked at her. This man proved to be her first husband don Alvaro, with whom she now fled from the castle, but on the road a gang of robbers fell upon them. Alvaro was killed, and the lady taken to the robbers' cave, where Gil Blas saw her and heard her sad tale. The lady was soon released, and sent to the castle of the marquis of Guardia. She found the marquis dying from grief, and indeed he died the day following, and Menecia retired to a convent.—Lesage, Gil Blas, i 11-14 (1715)

Mendo'za, a Jew prize-fighter, who held the belt at the close of the last century, and in 1791 opened the Lyceum in the Strand, to teach "the noble art of self-defence."

I would have dealt the fellow that abused you such a recompense in the fifth button that my friend Mendoza should not have placed it better.—R. Cumberland Shtra the Jew iv 2 (1770)

There is a print often seen in old picture shops of Humphreys and Mendoza sparring and a queer angular exhibition it is. What that is to the modern art of boxing Quick's style of acting was to Dowton's.—Records of a Stage Veteran.

Mendoza (Isaac), a rich Jew, who thinks himself monstrously wise, but is duped by every one. (See under ISAAC)—Sheridan, The Duenna (1775)

John Kemble (1757-1823) once designed to play Macbeth in Regina's Opera by Gas. A part about as much suited to him as Isaac Mendoza. It is notorious that he persisted in playing Charles Surface in the School for Scandal (Sheridan), till some was said to him. Mr Kemble, you have often given us Charles's martyrdom when shall we have his restoration!—W. C. Russell, Representative Actors 243.

Menec'h'mians, persons exactly like each other, as the brothers Dromio. So called from the Menæchmi of Plautus.

Menec'rates (4 syl.), a physician of Syracuse, of unbounded vanity and arrogance. He assumed to himself the title of Jupiter, and in a letter to Philip king of Macedon began thus "Menec'rates Jupiter to king Philip greeting." Being asked by Philip to a banquet, the physician was served only with frankincense, like the gods, but Menec'rates was greatly offended, and hurried home.

Each was Menec'rates of little worth
Who bore the ravine to be called presumed
To whom of incense Philip made a feast,
And gave pride, scorn, and hunger to digest.
Lord Brooke, Inquisition upon Fame, etc. (1654-1678)

Mene'ria, St. David's, in Wales. A corruption of Henmencw, its old British name.

Mengs (John), the surly innkeeper at Kirchhoff village.—Sir W. Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

Menippus (Satyr), a famous political satire, written during the time of what is called in French history the Holy League, the objects of which were to exterminate the huguenots, to confine the king (Henri III.) in a monastery, and to crown the duc de Guise. The satire is partly in verse, and partly in prose, and its object is to expose the perfidious intentions of Philip of Spain and the culpable ambition of the Guises.

It is divided into two parts, the first of which is entitled Catholicon d'Espagne, by Pierre Leroy (1593), exposing those who had been corrupted by the gold of Spain, the second part is entitled Abrege des Etats de la Ligue, by Gillot, Pithou, Rapin, and Passerat, published 1591.

* * Menippus was a cynic philosopher and poet of Gadara, in Phœnicia, who wrote twelve books of satires in prose and verse.

Varro wrote in Latin a work called The Satires of Menippus (Satyræ Menippææ).

Mennibojou, a North American Indian deity.

Menteith (The earl of), a linesman of the earl of Montrose.—Sir W. Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I.)

Mentor, a wise and faithful adviser or guide. So called from Mentor, a friend of Ulysses, whose form Minerva assumed when she accompanied Telemachos in his search for his father.—Fenelon, Télémaque (1700).

Mephistopheles (5 syl.), the sneering, jeering, jeering attendant demon of Faust in Goethe's drama of Faust, and Gounod's opera of the same name. Marlowe calls the name "Mephos-tophilis" in his drama entitled Dr Faustus Shakespeare, in his Merry Wives of Windsor, writes the name "Mephostophilus," and in the opera he is called "Mefistofele" (6 syl). In the old demonology, Mephostophilus was one of the seven chief devils, and second of the fallen archangels.

Mephostophilus, the attendant demon of Faustus, in Marlowe's tragedy of Dr Faustus (1589)

There is an awful melancholy about Marlowe's Mephostophilus, perhaps more expressive than the malignant mirth of that fiend in the renowned work of Goethe—Faust.

Mephostophilus, the spirit or familiar of sir John Faustus or [Dr] John Faust (Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, 1596). Subsequently it became a term of reproach, about equal to "imp of the devil."

Mercer (Mayor), at the presidency of Madras—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II.)

Merchant of Venice (The), Antonio, who borrowed 3000 ducats for three months of Shylock a Jew. The money was borrowed to lend to a friend named Bassanio, and the Jew, "in merry sport," instead of interest, agreed to lend the money on these conditions. If Antonio paid it within three months, he should pay only the principal, if he did not pay it back within that time, the merchant should forfeit a pound of his own flesh, from any part of his body the Jew might choose to cut it off. As Antonio's ships were delayed by contrary winds, he could not pay the money, and the Jew demanded the forfeiture. On the trial which ensued, Portia, in the dress of a law doctor, conducted the case, and when the Jew was going to take the forfeiture, stopped him by saying that the bond stated "a pound of flesh," and that therefore he was to shed no drop of blood, and he must cut neither more nor less than an exact pound, on forfeit of his life. As these conditions were practically impossible, the Jew was nonsuited and fined for seeking the life of a citizen—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice (1598).

The story is in the Gesta Romanorum, the tale of the bond being ch. xlviii., and that of the caskets ch. cix., but Shakespeare took his plot from a Florentine novella called Il Pecorone, written in the fourteenth century, but not published

"the sixteenth

There is a ballad on the subject, the date of which has not been determined. The bargain runs thus

No penny for the loan of it,
For one year shall you pay—
You may do me a good turn
Before my dying day
But we will have a merry jest,
For to be talk'd long
You shall make me a bond "quothe he,
That shall be large or strong.

Merchant's Tale (The), in Chaucer, is substantially the same as the first Latin metrical tale of Adolphus, and is not unlike a Latin prose tale given in the appendix of T. Wright's edition of Aesop's fables. The tale is this

A girl named May married January, an old Lombard baron 60 years of age, but entertained the love of Damyan, a young squire. She was detected in familiar intercourse with Damyan, but persuaded her husband that his eyes had deceived him, and he believed her—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales (1388).

Mercian Laws (See MARTIAN.)

Mercilla, a "maiden queen of great power and majesty, famous through all the world, and honoured far and nigh." Her kingdom was disturbed by a soldan, her powerful neighbour, stirred up by his wife Adicia. The "maiden queen" is Elizabeth, the "soldan," Philip of Spain, and "Adicia" is injustice, presumption, or the bigotry of popery—Spenser, Faery Queen, v. (1596).

Mercurial Finger (The), the little finger

The thumb in chiro-mancy we give Venus
The fore finger to Jove the midst to Saturn
The ring to Sol the least to Mercury
Ben Jonson, The Alchemist 1. 2 (1610)

Mercutio, kinsman of prince Escalus, and Romeo's friend. An airy, sprightly, elegant young nobleman, so full of wit and fancy that Drayden says Shakespeare was obliged to kill him in the third act, lest the poet himself should have been killed by Mercutio—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1598).

The light and fanciful humour of Mercutio serves to enhance and illustrate the romantic and passionate character of Romeo—Sir W. Scott The Drama.

William Lewis (1748-1811) was the "Mercutio" of the era. In every sense of the word mercurial. His airy breathless voice thrown to the audience before he appeared was the signal of his winged animal spirits, and when he gave a glance of his eye or touched with his finger another's ribs it was the very punctum saliens of playfulness and innuendo—Leigh Hunt The Town (1843).

Mercutio of Actors (The), Willam Lewis (1748-1811,

Mr Lewis displayed in acting a combination rarely to be found—that of the top and the real gentleman. With a voice a manner and a person all equally graceful and airy and features at once whimsical and genteel, he played on the top of his profession like a plume.—Leigh Hunt, The Toteu (1849)

Mercy, a young pilgrim, who accompanied Christians in her walk to Zion. When Mercy got to the Wicket Gate, she swooned from fear of being refused admittance. Mr Brisk proposed to her, but being told that she was poor,—left her, and she was afterwards married to Matthew, the eldest son of Christian—Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, II (1684)

Merdle (Mr), banker, a skit on the directors of the Royal British Bank, and on Mr Hudson "the railway king." Mr Merdle, of Harley Street, was called the "Master Mind of the Age." He became insolvent, and committed suicide. Mr Merdle was a heavily made man, with an obtuse head, and coarse, mean, common features. His chief butler said of him, "Mr Merdle never was a gentleman, and no ungentlemanly net on Mr Merdle's part would surprise me." The great banker was "the greatest forger and greatest thief that ever cheated the gallows."

Lord Declaus [Barnacle] began waving Mr Merdle about as Gigantic Enterprise, The Wealth of England, Credit, Capital Prosperity and all manner of blessings.—Ibid. II 24.

Mrs Merdle, wife of the bank swindler. After the death of her husband, society decreed that Mrs Merdle should still be admitted among the sacred few, so Mrs Merdle was still received and patted on the back by the upper ten.—C Dickens, Little Dorrit (1857)

Meredith (Mr), one of the conspirators with Redgauntlet.—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.)

Meredith (Mr Michael), "the man of mirth," in the managing committee of the Spa hotel.—Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III.)

Meredith (Sir), a Welsh knight.—Sir W Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.)

Meredith (Owen), pseudonym of the Hon Edward Robert Bulwer Lytton (lord Lytton), author of The Wanderer (1859), etc. This son of lord Bulwer Lytton, poet and novelist, succeeded to the peerage in 1873.

Merida (Marchioness), betrothed to count Valantin.—Mrs Inchbald, Child of Nature.

Meridarpax, the pride of mice

Now nobly towering o'er the rest, appears
A gallant prince that far transcends his years,
Pride of his sire And glory of his house
And more a Mars in combat than a mouse
His action bold, robust his ample frame
And Meridarpax his resounding name.

Farnell, The Battle of the Frogs and Mice III (about 1712).

Merid'ies or "Noonday Sun," one of the four brothers who kept the passages of Castle Perilous. So Tennyson has named him, but in the History of Prince Arthur, he is called "sir Permonès, the Red Knight"—Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette"), sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, I 129 (1470).

Merlin (Ambrose), prince of enchanters. His mother was Matilda, a nun, who was seduced by a "guileful sprite" or incubus, "half angel and half man, dwelling in mid-air betwixt the earth and moon." Some say his mother was the daughter of Pubidius lord of Math-traval, in Wales, and others make her a princess, daughter of Demetrius king of Demet'ia. Blaise baptized the infant, and thus rescued it from the powers of darkness.

Merlin died spell-bound, but the author and manner of his death are given differently by different authorities. Thus, in the History of Prince Arthur (sir T Malory, 1470), we are told that the enchantress Nimue or Nimve enwrigled the old man, and "covered him with a stone under a rock." In the Morte d'Arthur it is said "he sleeps and sighs in an old tree, spell-bound by Vivien." Tennyson, in his Idylls ("Vivien"), says that Vivien induced Merlin to take shelter from a storm in a hollow oak tree, and left him spell-bound. Others say he was spell-bound in a hawthorn bush, but this is evidently a blunder. (See MERLIN THE WILD.)

* * Merlin made "the fountain of love," mentioned by Bojardo in Orlando Innamorato, I 8.

Ariosto, in Orlando Furioso, says he made "one of the four fountains" (ch. XXVI.)

He also made the Round Table at Camelot for 150 knights, which came into the possession of king Arthur on his marriage with queen Guinever, and brought from Ireland the stones of Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain.

Allusion is made to him in the Faëry Queen, in Ellis's Specimens of Early English Metrical Romances, in Dryden's Polyolbon, in Keats's Hyperion, by sir W.

Scott, etc T Heywood has attempted to show the fulfilment of Merlin's prophecies

Of Merlin and his skill what region doth not hear?
Who of a British nymph was gotten whilst she played
With a seducing sprito
But all Demetri thro there was not found her peer Drayton Polyolbion v (1616)

Merlin (The English), W Lilly, the astrologer, who assumed the nom de plume of "Merlinus Anglicus" (1602-1681)

Merlin the Wild, a native of Caledonia, who lived in the sixteenth century, about a century after the great Ambrose Merlin the sorcerer Iordun, in his Scotichronicon, gives particulars about him It was predicted that he would die by earth, wood, and water, which prediction was fulfilled thus A mob of rusties hounded him, and he jumped from a rock into the Tweed, and was impaled on a stake fixed in the river bed His grave is still shown beneath an aged hawthorn bush at Drummelzier, a village on the Tweed

Merlin's Cave, in Dynevor, near Carmarthen, noted for its ghastly noises of rattling iron chains, brazen caldrons, groans, strokes of hammers, and ringing of anvils The cause is this Merlin set his spirits to fabricate a brazen wall to encompass the city of Carmarthen, and, as he had to call on the Lady of the Lake, bade them not slacken their labour till he returned, but he never did return, for Vivian by craft got him under the enchanted stone, and kept him there Tennyson says he was spell-bound by Vivian in a hollow oak tree, but the History of Prince Arthur (sir T Malory) gives the other version — Spenser, Faery Queen, iii 3 (1590)

Merop's Son, a nobody, a terra filius, who thinks himself somebody Thus Phalton (Merop's son), forgetting that his mother was an earthborn woman, thought he could drive the horses of the sun, but not being able to guide them, nearly set the earth on fire Many presume, like him, and think themselves capable or worthy of great things, forgetting all the while that they are only "Merop's son"

Merrilies (Meg), a half-crazy woman, part sibyl and part gipsy She is the ruler and terror of the gipsy race Meg Merrilies was the nurse of Harry Bertram — Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

In the dramatized version of Scott's novel Miss Cluthman (1840-?) made Meg Merrilies her own She showed therein indisputably the attributes of genius Such was her power over the intention and feeling of the part, that the mere words were quite a secondary matter It was the figure the gait the look the gesture the tone by which she put beauty and passion into language the most indifferent. — Henry Morley

Micaw'ber (Mr Wilkins), a most unpractical, half-clever man, a great speechifier, letter-writer, projector of bubble schemes, and, though confident of success, never succeeding. Having failed in everything in the old country, he migrated to Australia, and became a magistrate at Middlebay—C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

* * This truly amiable, erratic genius is a portrait of Dickens's own father, "David Copperfield" being Dickens, and "Mrs Nickleby" (one can hardly believe it) is said to be Dickens's mother

Michael (2 syl), the special protector and guardian of the Jews. This archangel is messenger of peace and plenty—Sale's Korān, ii notes

* * That Michael was really the protector and guardian angel of the Jews we know from Dan x 13, 21, vii 1

Milton makes Michael the leader of the heavenly host in the war in heaven. The word means "God's power." Gabriel was next in command to the archangel Michael Go Michael of celestial armies prince.

Paradise Lost vi. 41 (663)

* * Longfellow, in his Golden Legend, says that Michael is the presiding spirit of the planet Mercury, and brings to man the gift of prudence ("The Miracle-Play," iii, 1851)

Michael, the "trencher favourite" of Arden of Faversham, in love with Maria sister of Mosby. A weak man, who both loves and honours Arden, but is inveigled by Mosby to admit ruffians into Arden's house to murder him—Geo Lillo, Arden of Feversham (1692)

Michael god of Wind (St) At the promontory of Malen is a chapel built to St Michael, and the sailors say when the wind blows from that quarter, it is occasioned by the violent motion of St Michael's wings. Whenever they sail by that promontory, they pray St Michael to keep his wings still

Micomicon, the pretended kingdom of Dorothea (daughter of Cleonardo of Andalusia), a hundred days' journey from Meotia, and a nine years' voyage from Carthagina

Micomicona, the pretended queen of Micomicon. Don Quixote's adventure to Micomiconna comes to nothing, for he was taken home in a cage, almost as soon as he was told of the wonderful enchantments — Cervantes, Don Quixote, I. 11. 2 (1605).

Micromegas ("the little-great"), Voltaire's imitation of Gulliver's Travels

Midas (Justice), appointed to adjudge a musical contest between Pol and Pan. He decides in favour of Pan, whereupon Pol throws off his disguise, appears as the god Apollo, and, being indignant at the decision, gives Midas "the ears of an ass" — Kine O'Hara, Midas (1764)

Edward Shuter (1728-1776) was pronounced by Garrick "the greatest comic actor," and C. Dibdin says "Nothing on earth could have been superior to his 'Midas'"

Midas's Ears. The servant who used to cut the king's hair, discovering the deformity, was afraid to whisper the secret to any one, but, being unable to contain himself, he dug a hole in the earth, and, putting his mouth into it, cried out, "King Midas has ass's ears!" He then filled up the hole, and felt relieved

Middleburgh (Mr James), an Edinburgh magistrate — Sir W. Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Middlemas (Mr Matthew), a name assumed by general Witherington

Mrs Middlemas, wife of the general (born Zeha de Moncadar)

Pickard Middlemas, alias Richard Tre-sham, a foundling, apprenticed to Dr Gray. He discovers that he is the son of general Witherington, and goes to India, where he assumes the character of Sadoc, a black slave in the service of Mde Montreville. He delivers Menie Gray by treachery to Tippoo Saib, and Hyder Ali gives him up to be crushed to death by an elephant — Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Middlewick (Mr Perkin), a retired buttermann, the neighbour of Sir Geoffry Champneys, and the father of Charles. The buttermann is innately vulgar, drops his h's and inserts them out of place, makes the greatest geographical and historical blunders, has a tyrannical temper, but a tender heart. He turns his son adrift for marrying Violet Melrose an heiress, who snubbed the plebeian father. When reduced to great distress, the old buttermann goes to his son's squalid lodgings and relents. So all ends happily.

Charles Middlewick, son of the retired buttermann, well educated and a gentleman. His father wanted him to marry Mary Melrose, a girl without a penny, but he preferred Violet an heiress — H. J. Byron, Our Boys (1875)

Midlothian (The Heart of), a tale of the Porteous riot, in which the incidents of Effie and Jennie Deans are of absorbing interest. Effie was seduced by Geordie Robertson (alias George Staunton), while in the service of Mrs Saddletree. She murdered her infant, and was condemned to death, but her half-sister Jennie went to London, pleaded her cause before the queen, and obtained her pardon. Jennie, on her return to Scotland, married Reuben Butler, and Geordie Robertson (then Sir George Staunton) married Effie. Sir-George being shot by a gipsy boy, Effie (the lady Staunton) retired to a convent on the Continent—Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Midsummer Moon Dogs suffer from hydrophobia during the heat of midsummer, hence the term "Midsummer moon" means madness. It will be found amongst Ray's proverbs, and Olivia (in Twelfth Night) says to Malvolio, "Why, this is very midsummer madness!"

What's this midsummer moon! Is all the world gone a unadling!—Dryden Amphitryon iv 1 (1699)

Midsummer Night's Dream Shakespeare says there was a law in Athens, that if a daughter refused to marry the husband selected for her by her father, she might be put to death. Egæus (3 syl), an Athenian, promised to give his daughter Hermia in marriage to Demetrius, but as the lady loved Lysander, she refused to marry the man selected by her father, and fled from Athens with her lover. Demetrius went in pursuit of her, followed by Helena, who doted on him. All four came to a forest, and fell asleep. In their dreams a vision of fairies passed before them, and on awaking, Demetrius resolved to forego Hermia who disliked him, and to take to wife Helena who sincerely loved him. When Egæus was informed thereof, he readily agreed to give his daughter to Lysander, and the force of the law was not called into action (1592).

* * Several of the incidents of this comedy are borrowed from the Diana of Montemayor, a Spaniard (sixteenth century).

Misses (Miss), the handmaiden and "comforter" of Mrs Varden. A tall, gaunt young woman, addicted to pattens, slender and shrewish, of a sharp and acid visage. She held the male sex in utter contempt, but had a secret exception in favour of Sam Tappertit, who irreverently called her "scraggy." Miss Miggs always sided with madam against master, and made out that she was a suffering martyr, and he an inhuman Nero. She called him "mim," said her sister lived at "twenty-sivin," Simon she called "Simmun." She said Mrs Varden was "the mildest, amiablest, forgivingest-sperited, longest-sufferingest female in existence." Baffled in all her matrimonial hopes, she was at last appointed female turnkey to a county Bridewell, which office she held for thirty years, when she died—C. Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Miss Miggs baffled in all her schemes and cast upon a thankless undeserving world turned very sharp and sour, but the justices of the peace for Middlesex selected her from 124 competitors to the office of turnkey for a county Bridewell which she held till her decease more than thirty years afterwards, remaining single all that time.—Last chap.

Mign'on, a beautiful, dwarfish, fairy-like Italian girl, in love with Wilhelm her protector. She glides before us in the mazy dance, or whirls her tambourine like an Ariel. Full of fervour, full of love, full of rapture, she is overwhelmed with the torrent of despair at finding her love is not returned, becomes insane, and dies—Goethe, Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship (1794-6).

Sir W Scott drew his "Fenella," in Peveril of the Peak, from this character, and Victor Hugo has reproduced her in his Notre Dame, under the name of "Esmeralda."

Mignonnet, a fairy king, who wished to marry the princess brought up by Violenta the fairy mother.

Of all dwarfs he was the smallest. His feet were like an eagle's and close to the knees for legs he had none. His royal robes were not above half a yard long and trailed one third part upon the ground. His head was as big as a peck and his nose long enough for twelve birds to perch on. His beard was bushy enough for a canary's nest, and his ears reached a foot above his head.—Comtess D'Aunoy Fairy Tales (The White Cat, 1632).

Mikado of Japan, the spiritual supreme or chief pontiff. The temporal supreme is called the koubō, seagoon, or tycoon.

But thou Mikado thou hast spoken
The word at which all locks are broken.

St Paul's (January 1873)

Mil'an (The duke of), an Italian prince, an ally of the Lancastrians—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV).

Milan Decree, a decree of Napoleon Bonaparte, dated Milan, December 27, 1807, declaring "the whole British empire to be in a state of blockade, and prohibiting all countries from trading with Great Britain or using any article made therein."

* * As Britain was the best customer of the very nations forbidden to deal with her, this very absurd decree was a two-edged sword, cutting both ways.

Mildendo, the metropolis of Lilliput, the wall of which was two feet and a half high and eleven inches thick. The city was an exact square, and divided into four quarters. The emperor's palace, called Belfab'orac, stood in the centre of the city—Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Lilliput," iv, 1726)

Milesian Fables (Milesia Fabulae), very wanton and ludicrous tales. Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton (lord Lytton) published six of the Lost Tales of Miletus in rhymeless verse. He says he borrowed them from the scattered remnants preserved by Apollodorus and Conon, contained in the pages of Pausanias and Athenæus, or dispersed throughout the Scholiasts. The Milesian tales were, for the most part, in prose, but Ovid tells us that Aristides rendered some of them into verse, and Sisenna into Latin.

Junxit Aristides Milesia carmina secum Palus Milesides nec tamen arda sua est.

The original tales by Antonius Diogenes are described by Photius. It appears that they were great favourites with the luxurious Sybarites. A compilation was made by Aristides, by whom (according to Ovid) some were versified also. The Latin translation by Sisenna was made about the time of the civil wars of Marius and Sulla. Parthenius Niceus, who taught Virgil Greek, borrowed thirty-six of the tales, which he dedicated to Cornelius Gallus, and entitled Erôtikon Pathématon ("love stories").

Milesia Crimina, amatory offences. Venus was worshipped at Miletus, and hence the loose amatory tales of Antonius Diogenes were entitled Milesia Fabulae.

Milesians, the "ancient" Irish. The legend is that Ireland was once peopled by the Fir-bolg or Belgæ from Britain, who were subdued by Milesians from Asia Minor, called the Gaels of Ireland.

My family by my father's side are all the true old Milesians, and related to the O'Flahertys and O'Shaughnessys, and the M'Lauchlins, the O'Donnaghauns, O'Callaghans, O'Geogaghans and all the tick blood of the easton, and I myself am an O'Erall-gahan which is the eldest of them all.—C. Macklin, Love à-la-mode (1779).

Pate a Milesian blood being roused

Very Far West Indeed

Milford (Colonel), a friend of Sir Geoffrey Peveril—Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

Milford (Jack), a natural son of Widow Warren's late husband. He was the crony of Harry Dornton, with whom he ran "the road to ruin." Jack had a fortune left him, but he soon scattered it by his extravagant living, and was imprisoned for debt. Harry then promised to marry Widow Warren if she would advance him £6000 to pay off his friend's debts with. When Harry's father heard of this bargain, he was so moved that he advanced the money himself, and Harry, being set free from his bargain, married the widow's daughter instead of the widow. Thus all were rescued from "the road to ruin"—Holtcroft, The Road to Ruin (1792).

Milk-Pail (The), which was to gain a fortune. (See PERRETTE.)

Milk Street (London), the old Milk-market. Here Sir Thomas More was born.

Millamant, the pretendue of Edward Mirabell. She is a most brilliant girl, who says she "loves to give pain because cruelty is a proof of power, and when one parts with one's cruelty, one parts with one's power." Millamant is far gone in poetry, and her heart is not in her own keeping. Sir Wilful Witwoud makes love to her, but she detests "the superannuated lubber"—W. Congreve, The Way of the World (1700).

There never was a more perfect representation of feminine vivacity than Miss M. Tree's "Millamant" or "Lady Townshend"—a vivacity flowing from the light heartedness of an intelligent and good girl.—Talfourd (1821).

Miller (James), the "tiger" of the Hen Mr Flammer. James was brought up in the stable, educated on the turf and paré, polished and completed in the five-court. He was engaged to Mary Cluntz, the maid of Miss Bloomfield—C. Selby, The Unfinished Gentleman.

Miller (Joe), James Ballantyne, author of Old Joe Miller, by the Editor of New J M, three vols (1801).

* * Mottley compiled a jest-book in the reign of James II, entitled Joe Miller's Jests. The phrase, "That's a Joe Miller," means "that's a stale jest" or "that's a jest from Mottley's book."

Miller (Maximilian Christopher), the Saxon giant, height, eight feet. His hand measured a foot, his second finger was nine inches long, his head unusually large. He wore a rich Hungarian jacket and a huge plumed cap. This giant was exhibited in London in the year 1738. He died aged 60, was born at Leipzig (1674-1734).

Miller of Mansfield (Zac), John Cockle, a miller and cooper of Sherwood Forest. Hearing the report of a gun, John Cockle went into the forest at night to find poachers, and came upon the King (Henry VIII), who had been hunting, and had got separated from his courtiers. The miller collared him, but, being told he was a wayfarer, who had lost himself in the forest, he took him home with him for the night. Next day, the courtiers were brought to the same house, having been seized as poachers by the under-cooper. It was then discovered that the miller's guest was the King, who knighted the miller, and settled on him 1000 marks a year.—R. Dodsley, The King and the Miller of Mansfield (1757)

Miller of Trompington (The), Simon Simkin, an errant thief. Two scholars undertook to see that a sack of corn was ground for "Solar Hall College" without being tampered with, so one stood at the hopper, and the other at the trough below. In the mean time, Simon Simkin let loose the scholars' horse, and while they went to catch it he purloined half a bushel of the flour, which was made into cakes, and substituted meal in its stead. But the young men had their revenge, they not only made off with the flour, meal, and cakes without payment, but left the miller well trounced also.—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Reeve's Tale," 1358)

A trick something like that played off on the Miller of Trompington.—Letter of Kirkton xix. 23

Miller on the Dee "There was a Jolly Miller once lived on the River Dee," is a song by Isaac Bickerstaff, introduced in Love in a Village, i. 1 (1763)

Mills (Miss), the bosom friend of Dom. Supposed to have been blighted in early life in some love affair, and hence she looks on the happiness of others with a calm, supercilious benignity, and talks of her-self as being "in the desert of Sahara"—C. Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Millwood (Sarah), the courtesan who enticed George Barnwell to rob his master and murder his uncle. Sarah Millwood spent all the money that George Barnwell obtained by these crimes, then turned him out of doors, and impeached against him. Both were hanged.—George Lillo, George Barnwell (1782),

Daniel Ross (1728-1793) was once sent for to see a dying man who said to him: "Mr. Ross, some forty years ago I was a George Barnwell. I turned my master to rob by the extravagance of a Millbrook. I took her to see your performance of George Barnwell which so shocked me that I vowed to break off the connection and return to the path of virtue. I kept my resolution, repaid the money I had stolen and found a Maria. In my master's day after I have bequeathed you £1000. Would it were a larger sum! Farewell!"—Edinburgh Chronicle of Crime

Milly, the wife of William Swidger. She is the good angel of the tale.—C. Dickens, The Haunted Man (1848)

Milo, an athlete of Crotona, noted for his amazing strength. He could carry on his shoulders a four-year-old heifer. When old, Milo attempted to tear in twain an oak tree, but the parts, clinging on his hands, held him fast, till he was devoured by wolves.

Milo (The English), Thomas Topham of London (1710-1752)

Milton, introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Milton of Germany, Frederick Gottlieb Klopstock, author of The Messiah, an epic poem (1721-1803)

A very German Milton in deed.

Milton's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, was by Ryeburn.

Milvey (The Rev. Frank), a "young man expensively educated and wretchedly paid, with quite a young wife and half a dozen young children. He was under the necessity of teaching to eke out his scanty means, yet was generally expected to have more time to spare than the idlest person in the parish, and more money than the richest."

Mrs. Milvey (Margaretta), a pretty, bright little woman, emphatic and impulsive, but "something worn by anxiety." She had repressed many pretty tastes and bright fancies, and substituted instead schools, soup, flannel, coals, and all the week-day cares and Sunday coughs of a large population, young and old.—C. Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1861)

Minagrobis, admiral of the cats in the great sea-fight of the cats and rats. Minagrobis won the victory by devouring the admiral of the rats, who had made three voyages round the world in very excellent ships, in which he was neither one of the officers nor one of the crew, but a kind of interloper.—Comtesse D'Annoy, Jany Takes ("The White Cat," 1682)

the Turkish camp blew up, killing 600 men Byron says it was Minotti himself who fired the train, and that he perished in the explosion — Byron, Siege of Corinth (1816)

Minstrel (The), an unfinished poem, in Spenserian metre, by James Beattie Its design was to trace the progress of a poetic genius, born in a rude age, from the first dawn of fancy to the fulness of poetic rapture The first canto is descriptive of Edwin the minstrel, canto 11 is dull philosophy, and there, happily, the poem ends It is a pity it did not end with the first canto (1778-4)

And yet poor Edwin was no vulgar boy
Deep thought oft seemed to fix his infant eye
Dainties he brooded not, nor guile nor toy
Saw one short pipe of rudest minstrelsy
Silent when sad affectionate the shy
And now his look was most demurely sad
And now he laughed aloud yet none knew why
The neighbours stared and sighed yet blessed the lad
Some deemed him wondrous wise, and some believed him mad.

Canto I. 16.

Minstrel (Lay of the Last) Ladye Margaret, "the flower of Terviot," was the daughter of lord Walter Scott, of Branksome Hall She loved baron Henry of Cranstown, but between the two families a deadly feud existed One day, the elsin page of lord Cranstown envied the heir of Branksome Hall (then a lad) into the woods, where he fell into the hands of the English, who marched with 3000 men to Branksome Hall, but being told that Douglas was coming to the rescue with 10,000 men, the two armies agreed to settle by single combat whether the lad should be given up to the mother or be made king Edward's page The two champions were sir Richard Musgrave (English) and sir William Deloraine (Scotch) The Scotch champion slew sir Richard, and the boy was delivered to the mother It now turned out that sir William Deloraine was lord Cranstown, who claimed and received the hand of ladye Margaret as his reward — Sir W Scott (1805)

Minstrel of the Border, sir W Scott, also called "The Border Minstrel" (1771-1832)

Giants and sorcerers cannot withstand it.
Ermund Sigfu son Ldda (1130)

Miquelets (Lcs), soldiers of the Pyrenees, sent to co-operate with the dragoons of the Grand Monarque against the Camisards of the Cevennes

Mir'abel, the "wild goose," a travelled Monsieur, who loves women in a loose way, but abhors matrimony, and especially dislikes Orianna, but Orianna "chases" the "wild goose" with her woman's wiles, and catches him — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Wild-geese Chase (1652)

Mirabel (Old) He adores his son, and wishes him to marry Orianna As the young man shilly-shallies, the father enters into several schemes to entrap him into a declaration of love, but all his schemes are abortive

Young Mirabel, the son, called "the inconstant" A handsome, dashing young rake, who loves Orianna, but does not wish to marry Whenever Orianna seems lost to him, the ardour of his love revives, but immediately his path is made plain, he holds off However, he ultimately marries her — G Farquhar, The Inconstant (1702)

Mirabell (Edward), in love with Millamant He liled her, "with all her faults, nay, liked her for her faults, which were so natural that (in his opinion) they became her" — W Congreve, The Way of the World (1700)

Not all that Drury Lane affords

Mirabella, "a maiden fair, clad in mourning weeds, upon a mangy jade, unmeetly set with a lewd fool called Disdam" (canto 6) Timias and Serena, after quitting the hermit's cell, met her Though so sorely clad and mounted, the maiden was "a lady of great dignity and honour, but scornful and proud" Many a wretch did languish for her through a long life Being summoned to Cupid's judgment hall, the sentence passed on her was that she should "ride on a mangy jade, accompanied by a fool, till she had sired as many lovers as she had slain" (canto 7). Mirabella was also doomed to carry a leaky bottle which she was to fill with tears, and a torn wallet which she was to fill with repentance, but her tears and her repentance dropped out as fast as they were put in, and were trampled under foot by Scorn (canto 8) — Spenser, Fairy Queen, vi 6-8 (1596).

* * "Mirabella" is supposed to be meant for Rosalind, who jilted Spenser, and who is called by the poet "a widow's daughter of the glen, and poor."

Mir'amont, brother of justice Brisie, and uncle of the two brothers Charles (the scholar) and Eustace (the courtier). Miramont is an ignorant, testy old man, but a great admirer of learning and scholars — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Elder Brother (1637).

Miran'da, daughter of Prospero the exiled duke of Milan, and niece of Anthonio the usurping duke. She is brought up on a desert island, with Ariel the fairy spirit, and Caliban the monster, as her only companions. Ferdinand, son of the king of Naples, being shipwrecked on the island, falls in love with her, and marries her — Shakespeare, The Tempest (1609).

Identifying herself with the simple yet noble minded Miranda in the file of wonder and enchantment. — Sir W. Scott.

Miranda, an heiress, the ward of sir Francis Gripe. As she must obtain his consent to her marriage before she could obtain possession of her fortune, she pretended to love him, although he was 61 years old, and the old fool believed it. When, therefore, Miranda asked his consent to marry, he readily gave it, thinking himself to be the man of her choice, but the sly little missy laughed at her old guardian, and plighted her troth to sir George Airy, a man of 21 — Mrs Centlivre, The Busy Body (1709).

Mir'ja, one of the six Wise Men of the East, led by the guiding star to Jesus. Mirja had six sons, who followed his holy life — Klopstock, The Messiah, v (1771).

Mirror (Alasnam's), a mirror which showed Alasnam if "a beautiful girl was also chaste and virtuous." The mirror was called "the touchstone of virtue" — Arabian Nights ("Prince Zevn Alasnam").

Mirror (Cambuscan's), a mirror sent to Cambuscan' king of Tartary by the king of Araby and Ind. It showed those who consulted it if any adversity was about to befall them, if any individual they were interested in was friend or foe, and if a person returned love for love or not — Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Squire's Tale," 1388).

* * Sometimes called "Cannac's Mirror," but incorrectly so.

Mirror (Kelly's), Dr Dee's speculum. Kelly was the doctor's speculator or seer. The speculum resembled a "piece of polished channel coal."

Mirror (Lao's), a looking-glass which reflected the mind as well as the outward form — Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, vi (1759).

Mirror (Merlin's Magic) or Venus's looking-glass, fabricated in South Wales, in the days of king Ryence. It would show to those that looked therein anything which pertained to them, anything that a friend or foe was doing. It was round like a sphere, and was given by Merlin to king Ryence.

That never sees his kingdom might invade
But he it knew at home before he heard Tidings thereof.

Britomart, who was king Ryence's daughter and heiress, saw in the mirror her future husband, and also his name, which was sir Artegall — Spenser, Fairy Queen, iii 2 (1590).

Mirror (Priester John's), a mirror which possessed similar virtues to that made by Merlin. Priester John could see therein whatever was taking place in any part of his dominions.

* * Dr Dee's speculum was also spherical, and possessed a similar reputed virtue.

Mirror (Reynard's Wonderful). This mirror existed only in the brain of Master Fox. He told the queen lion that whoever looked therein could see what was being done a mile off. The wood of the frame was part of the same block out of which Gampart's magic horse was made — Reynard the Fox, xii (1498).

Mirror (Venus's), generally called "Venus's looking-glass," the same as Merlin's magic mirror (q v).

Mirror (Vulcan's). Vulcan made a mirror which showed those who looked into it the past, present, and future Sir John Davies says that Cupid handed this mirror to Antinous when he was in the court of Ulysses, and Antinous gave it to Penelope, who beheld therein the court of queen Elizabeth and all its grandeur

Vulcan the King of fire, that mirror wrought

Sir John Davies, Orchestra (1615)

Mirror of Human Salvation (Speculum Humanae Salvationis), a picture bible, with the subjects of the pictures explained in rhymes

Mirror of King Ryence, a mirror made by Merlin. It showed those who looked into it whatever they wished to see—Spenser, Fairy Queen, in (1590)

Mirror of Knighthood, a romance of chivalry. It was one of the books in don Quixote's library, and the curé said to the barber

In this same Mirror of Knighthood we meet with Pinabalo de Mortalhar and his companions with the twelve peers of France and Tarjain the historian. These gentlemen we will condemn only to perpetual exile as they contain something of the famous Bayardo's invention whence the Christian poet Ariosto borrowed the groundwork of his ingenious compositions to whom I should pay little regard if he had not written in his own language [Italian].—Cervantes Don Quixote, I. I. 6 (1605)

Mirror of all Martial Men, Thomas earl of Salisbury (died 1428)

Mirroure for Magistraiyes, begun by Thomas Sackville, and intended to be a poetical biography of remarkable Englishmen. Sackville wrote the "Introduction," and furnished one of the sketches, that of Henry Stafford duke of Buckingham (the tool of Richard III.) Baldwinne, Ferrers, Churehyard, Plaur, etc., added others. Subsequently, John Higgin, Richard Nichols, Thomas Blenerhasset, etc., supplied additional characters, but Sackville alone stands out pre-eminent in merit. In the "Introduction," Sackville tells us he was conducted by Sorrowe into the infernal regions. At the porch sat Remorse and Dread, and within the porch were Revenge, Miserie, Care, and Slope. Passing on, he beheld Old Age, Madrie, Famine, and Warre. Sorrowe then took him to Achiron, and ordered Chiron to ferry them across. They reached the three-headed Cerubrus and came to Pluto, where the poet saw several ghosts, the last of all being the duke of Buckingham, whose "complaynt" finishes the part written by Thomas Sackville (1557) (See BUCKINGHAM)

* * Henry Stafford duke of Buckingham must not be mistaken for George Villiers duke of Buckingham 150 years later

Mirza (The Vision of) Mirza, being at Grand Cairo on the fifth day of the moon, which he always kept holy, ascended a high hill, and, falling into a trance, beheld a vision of human life. First, he saw a prodigious tide of water rolling through a valley with a thick mist at each end—this was the river of time. Over the river were several bridges, some broken, and some containing three score and ten arches, over which men were passing. The arches represented the number of years the traveller lived before he tumbled into the river. Lastly, he saw the happy valley, but when he asked to see the secrets hidden under the dark clouds on the other side, the vision was ended, and he only beheld the valley of Bagdad, with its oxen, sheep, and camels grazing on its sides.—R Steele, Vision of Mirza (Spectator, 159)

Misbegot (Malcolm), natural son of Sybil knockwinnock, and an ancestor of sir Arthur Wardour—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.)

Miser (The), a comedy by H. Fielding, a réchauffé of Moliere's comedy L'Acare. Lovegold is "Harpagon," Frederick is "Cleante," Marianna is "Mariane," and Raminie is "La Liche." Lovegold a man of 60, and his son Frederick, both wish to marry Marianna, and in order to divert the old miser from his foolish passion, Marianna pretends to be most extravagant. She orders a necklace and ear-rings of the value of £3000, a petticoat and gown from a fabric which is £12 a yard, and besets the house with duns. Lovegold gives £2000 to break off the bargain, and Frederick becomes the bridegroom of Marianna.

Mishe-Mok'wa, the great bear slain

by Mladjceewis—Longfellow, Hiawatha, ii (1855)

Mishe-Nah'ma, the great sturgeon, "king of fishes," subdued by Hiawatha. With this labour, the "great teacher" taught the Indians how to make oil for winter. When Hiawatha threw his line for the sturgeon that king of fishes first persuaded a pile to swallow the bait and try to break the line, but Hiawatha threw it back into the water. Next, a sun-fish was persuaded to try the bait, with the same result. Then the sturgeon, in anger, swallowed Hiawatha and canoe also, but Hiawatha smote the heart of the sturgeon with his net and the king of fishes swam to the shore and died. Then the sea-gulls opened a rift in the dead body, out of which Hiawatha made his escape.

"I have slain the Mischance, Eaten the King of Fishes," said he.
Longfellow Hiawatha, viii (1855).

Misnar, sultan of India, transformed by Ulm into a toad. "He was disenchanted by the dervise Shemshel'nar, the most 'pious worshipper of Alla amongst all the sons of Asia." By prudence and pique, Misnar and his vizier Hiram destroyed all the enchanters which filled India with rebellion, and having secured peace, married Hem'junch, daughter of Zebenezzer sultan of Cassimir, to whom he had been betrothed when he was known only as the prince of Georgia.—Sir C. Morell [J. Riddle], Tales of the Genii, vi, vii (1751).

Misog'onus, by Thomas Rychardes, the "hard English comedy (1569). It is written in rhyming quatrains, and not in complete like Rolph Roster Doister and Gammer Gurton's Needle.

Misquote

Missin Her Teens, a farce by David Garrick (1753). Miss Biddy Bellair is in love with captain Lovett, who is known to her only by the name of Phodophil, but she coquets with captain Flash and Mr Fribble, while her aunt wants her to marry an elderly man by the name of Stephen Lovett, whom she detests. When the captain returns from the wars, she sets captain Flash and Mr Fribble together by the ears, and while they stand froning each other but afraid to fight, captain Lovett enters, recognizes Flash as a deserter, takes away his sword and dismisses Fribble as beneath contempt.

Mississippi Bubble, the "South Sea scheme" of France, projected by John Law, a Scotchman. So called because the projector was to have the exclusive trade of Louisiana, on the banks of the Mississippi, on condition of his taking on himself the National Debt (incorporated 1717, failed 1729).

The debt was 208 millions sterling. Law made himself sole creditor of this debt, and was allowed to issue ten times the amount in paper money, and to open "the Royal Bank of France" empowered to issue this paper currency. So long as a 20-franc note was worth 20 francs, the scheme was a prodigious success, but immediately the paper money was at a discount, a run on the bank set in, and the whole scheme burst.

Mistletoe Bough (The). The song so called is by Thomas Haynes Bayly, who died 1839. The tale is this: Lord Lovel married a young lady, a baron's daughter, and on the wedding night the bride proposed that the guests should play "hide-and-seek." The bride hid in an old oak chest, and the lid, falling down, shut her in, for it went with a spring-lock. Lord Lovel sought her that night and sought her next day, and so on for a week, but nowhere could he find her. Some years after, the old oak chest was sold, which, on being opened, was found to contain the skeleton of the bride.

Rogers, in his Italy, gives the same story, and calls the lady "Ginevra" of Modona.

Collet, in his Relics of Literature, has a similar story.

Another is inserted in the Causas Cebres.

Married Old Hall (near Winchester), once the residence of the Scymours, and afterwards of the Dacre family, has a similar tradition attached to it, and (according to the Post-Office Directory) "the very chest is now the property of the Rev J Haygartin, rector of Upham" (which joins Marl ell).

Bramshall, Hampshire, has a similar tale and chest.

The great house at Malsanger, near Basingstoke, also in Hampshire, has a similar tradition connected with it.

Mita, sister of Aude. She married sir Milton de Pennes, and became the mother of Mitaine. (See next art.)—Croquerintame, xi.

Mitaine, daughter of Mit- and Miton, and godchild of Charlemagne. She went in search of Fear Fortress, and found that it existed only in the imagination, for as she boldly advanced towards it, the castle gradually faded into thin air. Charlemagne made Mitaine, for this achievement, Roland's squire, and she fell with him in the memorable attack at Roncevaux (See previous art) — Croquemitaine, 111

Mite (Sir Matthew), a returned East Indian merchant, dissolute, dogmatical, ashamed of his former acquaintances, hating the aristocracy, yet longing to be acknowledged by them. He squanders his wealth on toadies, dresses his livery servants most gorgeously, and gives his chairmen the most costly crotches to wear in their coats. Sir Matthew is for ever astonishing weak minds with his talk about rupees, laces, jaghires, and so on — S 1 oote, The Nabob

Sir John Malcolm gives us a letter worthy of Sir Matthew Mite in which Clive orders 200 shirts, the best and finest that can be got for love or money — Macaulay

Mithra or Mithras, a supreme divinity of the ancient Persians, confounded by the Greeks and Romans with the sun. He is the personification of Ormuzd, representing fecundity and perpetual renovation. Mithra is represented as a young man with a Phrygian cap, a tunic, a mantle on his left shoulder, and lunging a sword into the neck of a bull. Scaliger says the word means "greatest" or "supreme." Mithra is the middle of the triplasian deity the Mediator, Eternal Intellect, and Architect of the world.

Her towers, where Mithra once had burned
To Moslem shrines—oh shame!—were turned Where slaves converted by the sword,
Th'elf mean apostate worship poured
And cursed the faith their sires adored.

Mithridate (3 syl), a medicinal confection, invented by Damoc'ratés, physician to Mithridatés king of Pontus, and supposed to be an antidote to all poisons and contagion. It contained seventy-two ingredients. Any prince is called a "mithridate."

Their kinsman garlic bring the poor man's mithridate.
Dryden Poliocton xx (1622)

Mithridate (3 syl), a tragedy by Racine (1673). "Momme" (2 syl), in this drama, was one of Mdlle Rachel's great characters.

Mithridates (4 syl), surnamed "the Great." Being conquered by the Romans, he tried to poison himself, but poison had no effect on him, and he was slain by a Gaul. Mithridatés was active, intrepid, indefatigable, and fruitful in resources, but he had to oppose such generals as Sulla, Lucullus, and Pompey. His ferocity was unbounded, his perfidy was even grand.

* * Racine has written a French tragedy on the subject, called Mithridate (1673), and N. Lee brought out his Mithridatés in English about the same time.

Mixit (Di), the apothecary at the Black Bear inn at Darlington — Sir W. Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I.)

M M Sketch (An), a memorandum sketch.

"Stay just a minute," said Kelly, who was making an M M sketch of the group — B H Duxton Jennie of the Prince's L 156

Mne'me (2 syl), a well-spring of Bœotia, which quickens the memory. The other well-spring in the same vicinity, called Le'thê, has the opposite effect, causing blank forgetfulness — Pliny.

Dantê calls this river Eu'noê. It had the power of calling to the memory all the good acts done, all the graces bestowed, all the mercies received, but no evil — Dantê, Purgatory, xxxviii (1308).

Mo'ath, a well-to-do Bedouin, father of Onc'za (3 syl) the beloved of Thal'aba. Onc'za, having married Thal'aba, died on the bridal night, and Moath arrived just in time to witness the mad grief of his son-in-law — Southey, Thal'aba the Destroyer, ii, viii (1797).

Mocc'asins, an Indian buskin.

He laced his moccasins [sic] he set to go
Campbell Gertrude of Wyoming I 14 (1869)

Mochingo, an ignorant servant of the princess Ero'ta — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Laws of Candy (1647).

Mock Doctor (The), a farce by H. Fielding (1733), epitomized from Le Medecin Malgré Lui, of Molière (1666). Sir Jasper wants to make his daughter marry a Mr. Dapper, but she is in love with Leander, and pretends to be dumb. Sir Jasper hears of a dumb doctor, and sends his two flunkies to fetch him. They ask one Dorcas to direct them to him, and she points them to her husband Gregory, a faggot-maker, but tells them he is very eccentric, and must be well beaten, or he will deny being a physician. The faggot-maker is accordingly beaten.

into compliance, and taken to the patient. He soon learns the facts of the case, and employs Leander as apothecary. Leander makes the lady speak, and completes his cure with "pills matrimoniae." Sir Jasper takes the joke in good part, and becomes reconciled to the alliance.

Mocking-Bird "During the space of a minute, I have heard it imitate the woodlark, chaffinch, blackbird, thrush, and sparrow. Their few natural notes resemble those of the nightingale, but their song is of greater compass and more varied."—Ashe, Travels in America, II, 73

Moclas, a famous Arabian robber, whose name is synonymous with "thief" (See ALMAYOR, the eriph, p. 24)

Mode (Sir William), in Mrs. Centlivre's drama The Beau's Duel (1703)

Modelove (Sir Philip), one of the four guardians of Anne Lovely the heiress. Sir Philip is an "old beau, that has May in his fancy and dress, but December in his face and his heels. He admires all new fashions, loves operas, balls, and masquerades" (act I, 1). Colonel Freeman personates a French fop, and obtains his consent to marry his ward, the heiress—Mrs. Centlivre, A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717)

Modely, a man of the world, gay, fashionable, and a libertine. He had scores of "lovers," but never loved till he saw the little rustic lass named Aura Freehold, a farmer's daughter, to whom he proposed matrimony.—John Philip Kemble, The Farm-house

Modish (Lady Betty), really in love with lord Morelove, but treats him with assumed scorn or indifference, because her pride prefers "power to ease." Hence she coquets with lord Foppington (a married man), to mortify Morelove and arouse his jealousy. By the advice of sir Charles Lasy, lord Morelove pays her out in her own coin, by flirting with lady Gravours, and assuming an air of indifference. Ultimately, lady Betty is reduced to common sense, and gives her heart and hand to lord Morelove.—Colley Cibber, The Careless Husband (1704)

Mrs. Oldfield excellently acted "lady Betty Modish" (says Walpole), and T. Davies says of Mrs. Pritchard (1711-1768) "She conceived accurately and acted pleasantly 'lady Townly,' 'lady Betty Modish,' and 'Maria' in The Non- juror." Mrs. Blofield is called "lady Betty Modish" in The Tatler, No. <

Modo, the fiend that urges to murder, and one of the five that possessed "poor Tom"—Shakespeare, King Lear, act IV, sc. I (1605)

Modied, son of Lot king of Norway and Anne own sister of king Arthur (pt. viii, 21, ix, 9). He is always called "the traitor." While king Arthur was absent, warring with the Romans, Modred was left regent, but usurped the crown, and married his aunt the queen (pt. x, 13). When Arthur heard thereof, he returned, and attacked the usurper, who fled to Winchester (pt. xi, 1). The king followed him, and Modred drew up his army at Cambula, in Cornwall, where another battle was fought. In this engagement Modred was slain, and Arthur also received his death-wound (pt. xi, 2). The queen, called Guinevere (but better known as Guen'ever), retired to a convent in the City of Legions, and entered the order of Julius the Martyr (pt. xi, 1).—Geoffrey, British History (1142)

* * This is so very different to the accounts given in Arthurian romance of Mordred, that it is better to give the two names as if they were different individuals.

Modred (Sir), nephew of king Arthur. He hated sir Lancelot, and sowed discord among the knights of the Round Table. Tennyson says that Modred "tampered with the lords of the White Horse," the brood that Hengist left Geoffrey of Monmouth says, he made a league with Cheldrie the Saxon leader in Germany, and promised to give him all that part of England which lies between the Humber and Scotland, together with all that Hengist and Horsa held in Kent, if he would aid him against king Arthur. Accordingly, Cheldrie came over with 800 ships, filled "with pagan soldiers" (British History, xi, 1).

When the king was in Brittany, whither he had gone to chastise sir Lancelot for adultery with the queen, he left sir Modred regent, and sir Modred raised a revolt. The king returned, drew up his army against the traitor, and in this "great battle of the West" Modred was slain, and Arthur received his death-wound.—Tennyson, Idyls of the King ("Guinevere," 1858)

* * This version is in accordance neither with Geoffrey of Monmouth (see previous art), nor with Arthurian romance (see MORDRED), and is, therefore, given separately

Modu, the prince of all devils that take possession of a human being

Mal'o was the chief devil that had possession of Sarah Williams but Richard Malby was molested by a still more considerable fiend called Modu the prince of all other devils.—Harsnett, Declaration of Popish Impostures 263.

Modus, cousin of Helen, a "musty library, who loved Greek and Latin," but cousin Helen loved the hookworm, and taught him how to love far better than Ovid could with his Art of Love. Having so good a teacher, Modus became an apt scholar, and eloped with cousin Helen.—S Knowles, The Hunchback (1831)

Mœchus, Adultery personified, one of the four sons of Caro (fleshly lust). His brothers were Porneus (fornication), Acatharus, and Asel'gcs (lasciviousness). In the battle of Mansoul, Mœchus is slain by Agneia (wifely chastity), the spouse of Eneat'cs (temperance) and sister of Parthenia (maidenly chastity) (Greek, mochos, "an adulterer")—Phineas Fletcher, The Purple Island, xi (1633)

Mœli'ades (4 syl) Under this name William Drummond signalized Henry prince of Wales, eldest son of James I, in the monody entitled Tears on the Death of Mœliades. The word is an anagram of Miles a Deo. The prince, in his masquerades and martial sports, used to call himself "Mœliadcs of the Isles"

Mœliadcs bright day-star of the West.
W Drummond Tears on the Death of Mœliades (1612).

The burden of the monody is Mœliadcs sweet courtly nymphs deplore

From Thulé to Hydaspés pearly shore.

Moffat (Mabel), domestic of Edward Redgauntlet—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Moha'di (Mahommed), the twelfth imam, whom the Orientals believe is not dead, but is destined to return and combat Antichrist before the consummation of all things

* * Prince Arthur, Merlin, Charlemagne, Barbarossa, dom Sebastian, Charles V, Elijah Mansur, Desmond of Kilmallock, etc, are traditionally not dead, but only sleeping till the fulness of time, when ereb will awake and effect most wondrous restorations

Mohair (The Men of), the citizens of France

The men of mohair, as the citizens were called—Argum Christi viii.

Moha'ieb, one of the evil spirits of Dom-Daniel, a cave "under the roots of the ocean." It was given out that these spirits would be extirpated by one of the family of Hoder'rah (3 syl), so they leagued against the whole race. First, Okba was sent against the obnoxious race, and succeeded in killing eight of them, Thal'aba alone having escaped alive. Next, Abdaldar was sent against Thalaba, but was killed by a simoom. Then Loha'br was sent to eut him off, but perished in a whirlwind. Lastly, Mohareb undertook to destroy him. He assumed the guise of a warrior, and succeeded in alluring the youth to the very "mouth of hell," but Thalaba, being alive to the deceit, flung Mohareb into the abyss.—Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer, v (1797)

Mohicans, Uncas the Indian chief, son of Chingachook, and called "Deer-foot"—F Cooper, The Last of the Mohicans (a novel, 1826)

The word ought to be pronounced Mo he' kanz, but is usually called Mo - he' lanz

Mohocks, a class of ruffians who at one time infested the streets of London. So called from the Indian Mohocks. At the Restoration, the street bullies were called Muns and Titire lus, they were next called Heectors and Scourers, later still, Nickers and Hawebites, and lastly, Mohocks or Mohawks

Now is the time that makes their revels keep Kindlers of riot, enemies of sleep
His scattered pence the flying Nicker flings

Mohun (Lord), the person who joined captain Hill in a dastardly attack on the actor Mountford on his way to Mrs Bracegirdles house, in Howard Street. Captain Hill was jealous of Mountford, and induced lord Mohun to join him in this "valiant exploit." Mountford died next day, captain Hill fled from the country, and Mohun was tried but acquitted

The general features of this cowardly attack are very like that of the count Koningsmark on Thomas Thynne of Langleate Hill. Count Koningsmark was in love with Elizabeth Percy (widow of the earl of Ogle), who was contracted to Mr Thynne, but before the wedding day arrived, the count, with some hired ruffians, assassinated his rival in his carriage as it was passing down Pall Mall

* * Elizabeth Percy, within three months of the murder, married the duke of Somerset

Moidart (John of), captain of the clan Ronald, and a chief in the army of Montrose—Sir W Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I)

Mor'na (2 syl), daughter of Reuthla'mir the principal man of Balelu'tha, a town on the Clyde, belonging to the Britons. Mor'na married Clessammor (the maternal uncle of Fingol), and died in childbirth of her son Carthon, during the absence of her husband—Ossian, Carthon

Mokanna, the name given to Hakem ben Hasehem, from a silver gauze veil worn by him "to dim the lustre of his face," or rather to hide its extreme ugliness. The history of this impostor is given by D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale (1697)

* * Mokanna forms the first story of Lalla Rookh ("The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan"), by Thomas Moore (1817)

Mokattam (Mount), near Cairo (Egypt), noted for the massacre of the caliph Hakem B'amr-ellah, who was given out to be incarnate deity and the last prophet who communicated between God and man (eleventh century). Here, also, fell in the same massacre his chief prophet, and many of his followers. In consequence of this persecution, Durzi, one of the "prophet's" chief apostles, led the survivors into Syria, where they settled between the Libanus and Anti-Libanus, and took the name of Durzis corrupted into Druses

As the khalif vanished erst
In what seemed death to un instructed eyes
On red Mokattam's verge.

Robert Browning The Fourn of the Druses 1

Molay (Jacques), grand-master of the knights Templars, as he was led to the stake, summoned the pope (Clement V) within forty days, and the king (Philippe IV) within forty weeks, to appear before the throne of God to answer for his death. They both died within the stated periods (See SUMMONS TO DRUSES)

Mohère (The Italian), Charlo Goldoni (1707-1793)

Mohère (The Spanish), Leandro Fernandez Moratin (1760-1828)

Moll Cutpurse, Mary Frith, who once attacked general Fairfax in Hounslow Heath

Moll Flanders, a woman of great beauty, born in the Old Bailey. She was twelve years a courtesan, five years a wife, twelve years a thief, eight years a convict in Virginia, but ultimately grew rich, and died a penitent in the reign of Charles II

* * Daniel Defoe wrote her life and adventures, which he called The Fortunes of Moll Flanders (1722)

Molly, Jagger's housekeeper. A mysterious, seared-looking woman, with a deep scar across one of her wrists. Her antecedents were full of mystery, and Pip suspected her of being Estella's mother—C Dickens, Great Expectations (1860)

Molly Maggs, a pert young housemaid, in love with Robin. She hates Polyglot the tutor of "Master Charles," but is very fond of Charles. Molly tries to get "the tuterer Polypot" into a scrape, but finds, to her consternation, that Master Charles is in reality the party to be blamed—J Poole, The Scapegoat

Molly Maguires, stout, active young men dressed up in women's clothes, with faces blackened, or otherwise disguised. This secret society was organized in 1818, to terrify the officials employed by Irish landlords to distrain for rent, either by grippers (bank-liffs), process-servers, keepers, or drivers (persons who impound cattle till the rent is paid)—W S Trench, Realities of Irish Life, 82

Molly Mog, an innkeeper's daughter at Oakingham, Berks. Molly Mog was the toast of all the gay sparks in the former half of the eighteenth century, but died a spinster at the age of 67 (1699-1766)

* * Gay has a ballad on this Fair Maid of the Inn. Mr Standen of Arborfield, the "enamoured swain," died in 1730. Molly's sister was quite as beautiful as "the fair maid" herself. A portrait of Gay still hangs in Oakingham inn

Molmutius (See MULMUTUS)

Moloch (ch = k), the third in rank of the Syriac hierarchy, Satan being first, and Belzebub second. The word means "king." The rabbins say the idol was of brass, with the head of a calf.

Moloch was the god of the Am'monites (3 syl), and was worshipped in Rabbah, their chief city

First Moloch horrid king besmeared with blood
Of human sacrifice and parents' tears
Though for the noise of drums and timbrels loud
Their children's cries unheard that passed thro' fire
To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite Worshipped in Rabbah.

Milton Paradise Lost l. 39^a etc. (1663)

Moly (Greek, mōlu), mentioned in Homer's Odyssey. A herb with a black root and white blossom, given by Hermēs to Ulysses, to counteract the spells of Circe (See ΗΕΜΟΝΥ)

That Moly once to wise Ulysses gave Milton, Comus (1634)

The root was black
With white the blossom Moly is its name
In heaven

Homer Odyssey x. (Cowper's trans.)

Mommui, the capital of the empire of Oberon king of the fairies. It is here he held his court

Momus's Lattice. Momus, son of Nox, blamed Vulcan, because, in making the human form, he had not placed a window in the breast for the discerning of secret thoughts

Were Momus lattice in our breast
My soul might brook to open it more widely
Than theirs [i.e. the nobles].

Dryden Werner ill. l. 1 (18²)

Mon or Mona, Anglesey, the residence of the druids. Suetonius Paulinus, who had the command of Britain in the reign of Nero (from A.D. 59 to 62), attacked Mona, because it gave succour to the rebellious. The frantic inhabitants ran about with fire-brands, their long hair streaming to the wind, and the druids invoked vengeance on the Roman army.—See Dryden, Polyolbion, viii (1612)

* * * "Mona" is the Latinized form of the British word mōn-au ("remote isle"). The "Isle of Man" is Mōn-au or mona ("remote isle") corrupted by misconception of the meaning of the word

Mon'aco (The King of), noted because whatever he did was never right in the opinion of his people, especially in that of Rabagas the demagogue. If he went out, he was "given to pleasure," if he stayed at home, he was "given to idleness," if he declared war, he was "wasteful of the public money," if he did not, he was "pusillanimous," if he ate, he was "self-indulgent," if he abstained, he was "priest-ridden"—M. Sarron, Rabagas (1872)

Monaco. Proud as a Monegasque. A French phrase. The tradition is that

Charles Quint ennobled every one of the inhabitants of Monaco

Monarch of Mont Blanc, Albert Smith, so called because for many years he amused a large London audience, night after night, by relating "his ascent up Mont Blanc" (1816-1860)

Monarque (Le Grand), Louis XIV of France (1638, 1643-1716)

Monastery (The), a novel by Sir W. Scott (1820). The Abbot appeared the same year. These two stories are tame and very defective in plot, but the character of Mary queen of Scots, in The Abbot, is a correct and beautiful historical portrait. The portrait of queen Elizabeth is in Kenilworth

Moncada (Matthias de), a merchant, stern and relentless. He arrests his daughter the day after her confinement of a natural son

Zula de Moncada, daughter of Matthias, and wife of general Witherington—Sir W. Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Moncaster. Newcastle, in Northumberland, was so called from the number of monks settled there in Saxon times. The name was changed, in 1080, to New-castle, from the castle built by Robert (son of the Conqueror), to defend the borderland from the Scotch

Monda'min, maize or Indian corn (mon-da-min, "the Spirit's grain")

Sing the mysteries of mondamin
Sing the blessing of the corn fields

Longfellow Hiawatha xiii (1855)

Mone'ses (3 syl), a Greek prince, betrothed to Arpsia, whom for the nonce he called his sister. Both were taken captive by Bajazet. Bajazet fell in love with Arpsia, and gave Mone'ses a command in his army. When Tamerlane overthrew Bajazet, Mone'ses explained to the Tartar king how it was that he was found in arms against him, and said his best wish was to serve Tamerlane. Bajazet now hated the Greek, and, as Arpsia proved obdurate, thought to frighten her into compliance by having Mone'ses hawstrung in her presence, but the sight was so terrible that it killed her—N. Rowe, Tamerlane (1702)

Money, a drama, by Lord E. L. B. Lytton (1840). Alfred Fielon, a poor scholar, was secretary and fiduciary of Sir John Vesey, but received no wages.

He loved Clara Douglas, a poor dependent of lady Franklin, proposed to her, but was not accepted, "because both were too poor to keep house." A large fortune being left to the poor scholar, he proposed to Georgina, the daughter of sir John Vesey, but Georgina loved sir Frederick Blount, and married him Evelyn, who loved Clara, pretended to have lost his fortune, and, being satisfied that she really loved him, proposed a second time, and was accepted.

Moneytrap, husband of Araminta, but with a tendre for Clarissa the wife of his friend Grape—Sir John Vanhrugh, The Confederacy (1695)

None who ever saw Parsons (1736-1793) can forget his effective mode of exclaiming while representing the character of the amorous old Moneytrap "Eh! how long will it be Flippant!"—O. Diddin.

Monflathers (Miss), mistress of a boarding and day establishment, to whom Mrs Jarley sent little Nell, to ask her to patronize the wax-work collection. Miss Monflathers received the child with frigid virtue, and said to her, "Don't you think you must be very wicked to be a wax-work child? Don't you know it is very naughty to be a wax child when you might have the proud consciousness of assisting, to the extent of your infant powers, the noble manufactures of your country?" One of the teachers here chimed in with "How doth the little—," but Miss Monflathers remarked, with an indignant frown, that "the little busy bee" applied only to genteel children, and the "works of labour and of skill" to punting and embroidery, not to vulgar children and wax-work shows—Charles Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop, xxi (1840)

Monford, the lover of Charlotte Whimsey. He plans various devices to hoodwink her old father, in order to elope with the daughter—James Cobb, The First Floor (1756-1818)

Monime (2 syl), in Racine's tragedy of Mithridate. This was one of Mdlle Rachel's great characters, first performed by her in 1838

Monim'ia, "the orphan," sister of Chamont and ward of lord Acasto. Monimia was in love with Acasto's son Castalio, and privately married him. Polydore (the brother of Castalio) also loved her, but his love was dishonourable. By treachery, Polydore obtained admission to Monimia's chamber, and passed the bridal night with her, Monimia supposing him to be her husband, but when next day she discovered the deceit, she poisoned herself, and Polydore, being apprised that Monimia was his brother's wife, provoked a quarrel with him, ran on his brother's sword, and died—Otway, The Orphan (1680)

Mero tears have been shed for the orrows of 'Dolci dura and Monimia' than for those of Juliet' and 'Desdemona'—Sir W. Scott The Drama

Monum'ia, in Smollett's novel of Count Fathom (1754)

Monphies (Richie), the honest, self-willed Scotch servant of lord Nigel Olifaunt of Glenvarloch—Sir W. Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Monk (General), introduced by sir Walter Scott in Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Monk (The Bud Singing to a). The monk is Felix, who listened to a bird for a hundred years, and thought the time only an hour—Longfellow, The Golden Legend, ii (1851)

Monk (The), a novel, by Matthew G. Lewis (1794)

Monk Lewis, Matthew Gregory Lewis, so called from his novel (1773-1818)

Monk of Bury, John Lydgate, poet, who wrote the Siege of Troy, the Story of Thebes, and the Tall of Princes (1375-1460)

Nothynge I am experte in poetry.
As the monke of Bury flourde of eloquence Stephen Hawes The Pastime of Pleasure (1515)

Monk of Westminster Richard of Cirencester, the chronicler (fourteenth century)

This chronicle, On the Ancient State of Britain, was first brought to light in 1747, by Dr Charles Julius Bertram, professor of English at Copenhagen, but the original being no better known than that of Thomas Rowley's poems, published by Chatterton, grave suspicions exist that Dr Bertram was himself the author of the chronicle

Monks (The Father of), Ethelwold of Winchester (*-984)

Monks, alias Edward Leeford, a violent man, subject to fits. Edward Leeford, though half-brother to Oliver Twist, was in collusion with Bill Sikes to ruin him. Failing in this, he retired to America, and died in jail.—C. Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837).

Monkbarnes (Laird of), Mr Jonathan

Oldbuck, the antiquary — Sir W Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Mon'ker and Nakir [Na'ker'], the two examiners of the dead, who put questions to departed spirits respecting their belief in God and Mahomet, and award their state in after-life according to their answers — Al Korân

Do you not see those spectres that are stirring the burning coals? Are they Monkir and Nakir come to throw us into them? — W Beckford Vathek (1786)

Monmouth, the surname of Henry V of England, who was born in that town (1388, 1413–1422)

* * Mon-mouth is the mouth of the Monnow

Monmouth (The Duke of), commander-in-chief of the royal army — Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

* * The duke of Monmouth was nicknamed "The Little Duke," because he was diminutive in size. Having no name of his own, he took that of his wife, "Scott," countess of Buccleuch. Pepys says "It is reported that the king will be tempted to set the crown on the Little Duke" (Diary, seventeenth century)

Monmouth Caps "The best caps" (says Fuller, in his Worthies of Wales, 50) "were formerly made at Monmouth, where the Cappen's Chapel doth still remain"

Monmouth Street (London), called after the duke of Monmouth, natural son of Charles II, executed for rebellion in 1685. It is now called Dudley Street

Mon'nema, wife of Quia'ra, the only persons of the whole of the Gu'irani race who escaped the small-pox plague which ravaged that part of Paraguay. They left the fatal spot, and settled in the Mondai woods. Here they had one son Yeruti, and one daughter Mooma, but Qui'ra was killed by a jaguar before the latter was born. Mon'nema left the Mondai woods, and went to live at St Joselin, in Paraguay, but soon died from the effects of a house and city life — Southey, A Tale of Paraguay (1814)

Monsieur le duc, Louis Henri de Bourbon, eldest son of the prince de Condé (1692–1740)

Monsieur Thomas, a drama by Beaumont and Fletcher (1619)

Monsieur Tonson, a farce by Monieriff. Jack Ardourly falls in love with Adolphine de Courey in the street, and gets Tom King to assist in ferreting her out. Tom King discovers that his sweetening lives in the house of a French refugee, a barber, named Mon Morbleu, but not knowing the name of the young lady, he inquires for Mr Thompson, hoping to pick up information. Mon Morbleu says no Mon Tonson lives in the house, but only Mde Bellegarde and Mlle Adolphine de Courey. The old Frenchman is driven almost crazy by different persons inquiring for Mon Tonson, but ultimately Jack Ardourly marries Adolphine, whose mother is Mrs Thompson after all.

Taylor wrote a drama of the same title in 1767

Monster (The), Renwick Williams, a wretch who used to prowl about London by night, armed with a double-edged knife, with which he mutilated women. He was condemned July 8, 1790

Mont Dieu, a solitary mound close to Dumfermline, owes its origin, according to story, to some unfortunate monks who, by way of penance, carried the sand in baskets from the sea-shore at Inverness

At Linton is a fine conical hill attributed to two sisters, nuns, who were compelled to pass the whole of the sand through a sieve, by way of penance, to obtain pardon for some crime committed by their brother

Mont Rognon (Baron of), a giant of enormous strength and insatiable appetite. He was windy-legged, had an elastic stomach, and four rows of teeth. He was a paladin of Charlemagne, and one of the four sent in search of Croquemitaine and Fear Fortress—Croquemitaine.

Mont St. Jean or Watiloo So-and-so was my Mont St. Jean, means it was my coup de grace, my final blow, the end of the end.

Juan was my Norow [turning point], and Fallero [Fickle] my Leipic [downfall], and my Mont St. Jean seems Cain.

Mont St. Michel, in Normandy. Here nine druidesses used to sell arrows to sailors to charm away storms. The arrows had to be discharged by a young man 20 years of age.

The Laplanders drove a profitable trade by selling winds to sailors. Even so late as 1814, Bessie Millie, of Pomona (Orkney Islands), helped to eke out a livelihood by selling winds for sixpence.

The king of Sweden could make the winds blow from any quarter he liked by a turn of his cap. Hence he was nicknamed 'Wind-Cap.'

Mont Trésor, in France, so called by Gontran "the Good," king of Burgundy (sixteenth century). One day, weary with the chase, Gontran laid himself down near a small river, and fell asleep. The squire, who watched his master, saw a little animal come from the king's mouth, and walk to the stream, over which the squire laid his sword, and the animal, running across, entered a hole in the mountain. When Gontran was told of this incident, he said he had dreamt that he crossed a bridge of steel, and, having entered a cave at the foot of a mountain, entered a palace of gold. Gontran employed men to undermine the hill, and found there vast treasures, which he employed in works of charity and religion. In order to commemorate this event, he called the hill Mont Trésor—Clud Paradis, Symbola Heroica.

* * This story has been ascribed to numerous persons.

Montague (3 syl), head of a noble house in Verona, at feudal enmity with the house of Capulet. Romeo belonged to the former, and Juliet to the latter house.

Lady Montague, wife of lord Montague, and mother of Romeo—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1598).

Montalban.

Don Kyrie Livson de Montalban, a hero of romance, in the History of Turan the White.

Thomas de Montalban, brother of don Kyrie Livson, in the same romance of chivalry.

Ronald de Montalban, a hero of romance, in the Mirror of Knighthood, from which work both Bojardo and Ariosto have largely borrowed.

Mon'talban', now called Montauban (a contraction of Mons Albanus), in France, in the department of Tarn-et-Garonne.

Jousted in Aspermont or Mon'talban'
Milton Paradise Lost l. 53 (1665)

Montalban (The count), in love with Volanté (3 syl) daughter of Balthazar. In order to sound her, the count disguised himself as a father confessor, but Volanté detected the trick instantly, and said to him, "Come, come, count, pull off your lion's hide, and confess yourself an ass." However, as Volanté really loved him, all came right at last.—J. Robin, The Homonymoon (1801).

Montanto (Signor), a master of fence and a great braggart—Ben Jonson, Every Man in His Humour (1598).

Montargis (The Dog of), named Dragon. It belonged to captain Aubri de Montdidier, and is especially noted for his fight with the chevalier Richard Macaire. The dog was called Montargis, because the encounter was depicted over the chimney of the great hall in the castle of Montargis. It was in the forest of Bondi, close by this castle, that Aubri was assassinated.

Montenay (Sir Philip de), an old English knight—Sir W. Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Montenegro The natives say "When God was distributing stones over the earth, the bag that held them burst over Montenegro," which accounts for the stoniness of the land.

Montesinos, a legendary hero, who received some affront at the French court, and retired to La Mancha, in Spain. Here he lived in a cavern, some sixty feet deep, called "The Cavern of Montesinos." Don Quixote descended part of the way down this cavern, and fell into a trance, in which he saw Montesinos himself, Durandarte and Belriana under the spell of Merlin, Dulcin'ea del Toboso enchanted into a country wench, and other visions, which he more than half believed to be realities —Cervantes, Don Quixote, II ii 5, 6 (1615)

* * This Durandarté was the cousin of Montesinos, and Belerma the lady he served for seven years. When he fell at Roncesvallés, he prayed his cousin to carry his heart to Belerma Montespan (The marquis de), a conceited court fop, silly, and heartless. When Louis XIV took Mde de Montespan for his concubine, he banished the marquis, saying

Your strange and countless follies—
The scenes you make—your loud domestic broils—
Bring scandal on our court Decorum needs
Your banishment Go I
And for your separate household which entails
A double cost our treasure shall accord you
A hundred thousand crowns.

Act iv 1.

The foolish old marquis says, in his self-conceit

A hundred thousand crowns for being civil
To one another! Well now that's a thing
That happens but to marquises. It shows
My value in the state. The king esteems
My comfort of such consequence to France
He pays me down a hundred thousand crowns
Rather than let my wife disturb my temper!

Act v 2.

Madame de Montespan, wife of the marquis. She supplanted La Vallière in the base love of Louis XIV. La Vallière loved the man, Montespan the king. She had wit to warm but not to burn, energy which passed for feeling, a head to check her heart, and not too much principle for a French court. Mde de Montespan was the protégée of the duke de Lauzun, who used her as a stepping-stone to wealth, but when in favour, she kicked down the ladder by which she had climbed to power. However, Lauzun had his revenge, and when La Vallière took the veil, Mde de Montespan was banished from the court —Lord E. L. B. Lytton, The Duchess de la Valliere (1836)

Montfaucon (The lady Calista of), attendant of queen Berengaria —Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I)

Moody (John), the guardian of Peggy Thrift an heiress, whom he brings up in the country, wholly without society John Moody is morose, suspicious, and unsocial When 50 years of age, and Peggy 19, he wants to marry her, but is outwitted by "the country girl," who prefers Belville, a young man of more suitable age

Althea Moody, sister of John She jilts Sparkish a conceited fop, and marries Harcourt—The Country Girl (Garnet, altered from Wycherly)

Mooma, younger sister of Yeruti. Their father and mother were the only persons of the whole Guarani race who escaped a small-pox plague which ravished that part of Paraguay They left the fatal spot and lived in the Mondai woods, where both their children were born Before the birth of Mooma, her father was eaten by a jaguar, and the three survivors lived in the woods alone When grown to a youthful age, a Jesuit priest persuaded them to come and live at St Joëhnn (3 syl), so they left the wild woods for a city life Here the mother soon flung and died Mooma lost her spirits, was haunted with thick-coming fancies of good and bad angels, and died Yeruti begged to be baptized, received the rite, cried, "Ye are come for me" I am ready," and died also—Southey, A Tale of Paraguay (1814)

Moon (The) increases with horns towards the east, but wanes with horns towards the west

The Moon Danté makes the moon the first planetary heaven, "the tardiest sphere of all the ten," and assigned to those whose vows "were in some part neglected and made void" (canto iii)

It seemed to me as if a cloud had covered us,

Receives, and rests unbroken

—Danté, Paradise, II (1311)

Moon (Blue) "Once in a blue moon," very occasionally, once in a while Similar to "Greek kalends"

Does he often come of an evening? asks Jennie
"Oh just once in a blue moon and then always with a friend"—B H. Fuxton Jennie of the Primrose, II 140

Moon (Man in the), said to be Carr, with a bundle of thorns

Now doth Cain with fork of thorns confine
On either hemisphere touching the wave
Beneath the towers of Seville. Yesternight
The moon was round

Danté Hell x. (1300)

Moon (Spots in the) Danté makes Beatrice say that these spots are not due to diversity of density or rarity, for, if so, in eclipses of the sun, the sun would be seen through the rare portions of the moon more or less distinctly. She says the spots are wholly due to the different essences of the "planet," which reflect in different ways the effluence of the heaven, "which peace divine inhabits"

From hence proceeds that which from light to light Seems different, and not from dense to rare

Danté, Paradise II (1311)

Milton makes Raphael tell Adam that the spots on the moon are due to clouds and vapours "not yet into the moon's substance turned," that is, undigested aliment

For know whatever was created needs
To be sustained and fed Of elements,
The grosser feeds the purer—earth the sea—
Earth and the sea feed air—the air those fires
Ethereal—and as lowest, first the moon
Whence in her visage round, those spots—unpurged Vapours not yet into her substance turned.

Moors The Moors of Aragon are called Tauragins, those of Granada are Mudjares, and those of Fez are called Liches. They are the best soldiers of the Spanish dominions. In the Middle Ages all Mohammedans were called Moors, and hence Camoens, in the Lusiad, viii, calls the Indians so

Mopes (Mr), the hermit who lived on Tom Tiddler's Ground. He was dirty, vain, and nasty, "like all hermits," but had landed property, and was said to be rich and learned. He dressed in a blanket and skewer, and, by steeping himself in soot and grease, soon acquired immense fame. Rumour said he murdered his beautiful young wife, and abandoned the world. Be this as it may, he certainly lived a nasty life. Mr Traveller tried to bring him back into society, but a tinker said to him, "Take my word for it, when iron is thoroughly rotten, you can never botch it, do what you may."

Mordent, father of Joanna by a former wife. In Mordent's early life Anne, his "dream," Joanna and herself are to be brought up by strangers. Joanna is placed under Mrs. Knell, a camp and Mordent consents to a proposal of Leman to run off with her. Mordent is not enlightened with the world - a led way, with a guiding conscience. He sins and suffers the anguish of remorse, does wrong, and blames Providence because when he is over the storm he sweeps the whirlwind.

Lady Anne, the wife of Mordaunt, daughter of the earl of Oxford, sister of a Mordaunt, niece of Lady Mary, and one of her uncles is a bishop. Morgia'na, the female slave, first of Cassim, and then of Ali Baba, "crafty, cunning, and fruitful in inventions." When the thief marked the door of her master's house with white chalk in order to recognize it, Morgiana marked several other doors in the same manner, next day, she observed a red mark on the door, and made a similar one on others, as before. A few nights afterwards, a merchant with thirty-eight oil-jars begged a night's lodging, and as Morgiana wanted oil for a lamp, she went to get some from one of the leather jars. "Is it time?" asked a voice. "Not yet," replied Morgiana, and going to the others, she discovered that a man was concealed in thirty-seven of the jars. From the last jar she took oil, which she made boiling hot, and with it killed the thirty-seven thieves. When the captain discovered that all his men were dead, he decamped without a moment's delay. Soon afterwards, he settled in the city as a merchant, and got invited by Ali Baba to supper, but refused to eat salt. This excited the suspicion of Morgiana, who detected in the pretended merchant the captain of the forty thieves. She danced awhile for his amusement, playfully sported with his dagger, and suddenly plunged it into his heart. When Ali Baba knew who it was that she had slain, he not only gave the damsel her liberty, but also married her to his own son.—Arabian Nights ("Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves")

Morice (Gil or Child), the natural son of lady Barnard, "brought forth in her father's house with mickle sin and shame." One day, Gil Morice sent Willie to the baron's hall, with a request that lady Barnard would go at once to Greenwood to see the child. Lord Barnard, fancying the "child" to be some piramour, forbade his wife to leave the hall, and went himself to Greenwood, where he slew Gil Morice, and sent his head to lady Barnard. On his return, the lady told her lord he had slain her son, and added, "W' that same spear, oh, pierce my heart, and put me out o' pain!" But the baron repented of his hasty deed, and cried, "I'll av lament for Gil Morice, as gin he were mine ain"—Percy, Reliques, etc., III.

Morose (J. t.), an elderly old hunter, who has to hear any voice but his own. His nephew, Sir Daphne, wants to bring out of him a third of his property, and proceeds thus. He gets a lad to personate "a silent woman," and the phenomenon so delights the old man, that he consents to a marriage. No sooner is the ceremony over, than the boy-wife assumes the character of a virago of loud and ceaseless tongue. Morose is half mad, and promises to give his nephew a third of his income if he will take this intolerable plague off his hands. The trick being revealed, Morose retires into private life, and leaves his nephew master of the situation—Ben Jonson, The Silent Woman (1609).

Benjamin John (1655-1746) seemed to be proud to wear the poet's double name, and was particularly great in all that author's plays that were usually performed viz. "Wasp," "Corbaccio," "Morose" and "Ananias"—Chetwood.

("Wasp" in Bartholomew Fair, "Corbaccio" in The Fox, and "Ananias" in The Alchemist.)

Moroug, the monkey mistaken for the devil. A woman of Cumbalu died, and Moroug, wishing to imitate her, slipped into her bed, and dressed himself in her night-clothes, while the body was carried to the cemetery. When the funeral party returned, and began the usual lamentations for the dead, pug stretched his night-capped head out of the bed and began moaning and grimaicing most hideously. All the mourners thought it was the devil, and scampered out as fast as they could run. The priests assembled, and resolved to exorcise Satan, but pug, noting their terror, flew on the chief of the bonzes, and bit his nose and ears most viciously. All the others fled in disorder, and when pug had satisfied his humour, he escaped out of the window. After a while, the bonzes returned, with a goodly company well armed, when the chief bonze told them how he had fought with Satan, and prevailed against him. So he was canonized, and made a saint in the calendar for ever—T. S. Guelette, Chinese Tales ("The Ape Moroug," 1723).

Morrel or Morell, a goat-herd who invites Thomañin, a shepherd, to come to the higher grounds, and leave the low-lying lands. He tells Thomañin that many hills have been canonized, as St. Michael's Mount, St. Bridget's Bower in Kent, and so on, then there was mount Sinai and mount Parnassus, where the Muses dwelt. Thomañin replies, "The low lands are safer, and hills are not for shepherds." He then illustrates his remark by the tale of shepherd Algrind, who sat like Morrel on a hill, when an eagle, taking his white head for a stone, let on it a shell-fish in order to break it, and all-to cracked his skull [Æschylus was killed by a tortoise dropped on his head by an eagle]—Spenser, Shephearides Calendar, vii

(This is an allegory of the high and low church parties. Morel is an anagram of Elmer or Aylmer bishop of London, who "sat on a hill," and was the leader of the high-church party. Algrind is Grindal archbishop of Canterbury, head of the low-church party, who in 1578 was sequestered for writing a letter to the queen on the subject of puritanism. Thomalin represents the puritans. This could not have been written before 1578, unless the reference to Algrind was added in some later edition.)

MORRIS, a domestic of the earl of Derby.—Sir W. Scott, Peter of the Peal (time, Charles II.)

Morris (Mr.), the timid fellow-traveller of Frank Osbaldistone, who carried the portmanteau. Osbaldistone says, concerning him, "Of all the propensities which teach mankind to torment themselves, that of causeless fear is the most irritating, busy, painful, and pitiable."—Sir W. Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I.)

Morris (Peter), the pseudonym of John G. Lockhart, in Peter's Letters to His Kinsfolk (1819)

Morris-Dance, a comic representation of every grade of society. The characters were dressed partly in Spanish and partly in English costume. Thus, the huge sleeves were Spanish, but the laced stomacher English. Hobby-horse represented the king and all the knightly order, Maid Marian, the queen, the friar, the clergy generally, the fool, the court jester. The other characters represented a franklin or private gentleman, a churl or farmer, and the lower grades were represented by a clown. The Spanish costume is to show the origin of the dance.

A representation of a morris-dance may still be seen at Betley, in Staffordshire, in a window placed in the house of George Tollet, Esq., in about 1620.

Morrison (Hugh), a Lowland drover, the friend of Robin Oig.—Sir W. Scott, The Two Drovers (time, George III.)

Mortality (Old), a religious itinerant, who frequented country churchyards and the graves of the covenanters.

He was first discovered in the burial-ground at Ganderclough, clearing the moss from the grey tombstones, renewing with his chisel the half-defaced inscriptions, and repairing the decorations of the tombs.—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II.)

 "Old Mortality" is said to be meant for Robert Patterson.

Morta'ra, the boy who died from being covered all over with gold-leaf by Leo XII., to adorn a pageant.

Mortcloke (Mr.), the undertaker at the funeral of Mrs. Margaret Bertram of Singleside.—Sir W. Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II.)

Morte d'Arthur, a compilation of Arthurian tales, called on the title-page The History of Prince Arthur, compiled from the French by Sir Thomas Malory, and printed by William Caxton in 1476. It is divided into three parts. The first part contains the birth of King Arthur, the establishment of the Round Table, the romance of Balin and Balan, and the beautiful allegory of Gareth and Lynet. The second part is mainly the romance of Sir Tristram. The third part is the romance of Sir Launcelot, the quest of the holy grail, and the death of Arthur, Guenever, Tristram, Lancelot, and Launcelot.

 The difference of style in the third part is very striking. The end of ch. 44, pt. 1 is manifestly the close of a romance. It is a pity that each romance is not marked by some formal indication, thus, pt. 1 bk. 1, etc., and each book might be subdivided into chapters.

This book was finished the ninth year of the reign of King Edward IV. by Sir Thomas Malory knight. Thus endeth this noble and joyous book entitled The Morte of the first life of the noble knight Sir Lancelot, of the holy Sangreall and in the end the dolorous death and departing out of the world of them all.—Concluding paragraph.

Morte d'Arthur, by Tennyson.—The poet supposes Arthur (wounded in the great battle of the West) to be borne off the field by Sir Bedivere. The wounded monarch directed Sir Bedivere to cast Excalibur into the mere. Twice the knight disobeyed the command, intending to save the sword, but the dying king detected the fraud, and insisted on being obeyed. So Sir Bedivere cast the sword into the mere, and "an arm, clothed in white samite, caught it by the hilt, brandished it three times, and drew it into the mere."

Sir Bedivere then carried the dying king to a barge, in which were three queens, who conveyed him to the island-valley of Avilion, "where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow, nor ever wind blows loudly" Here was he taken to be healed of his grievous wound, but whether he lived or died we are not told

The idyll called The Passing of Arthur is verbatim, like the Morte d'Arthur, with an introduction tacked on, but from "So all day long" (twelfth paragraph) to the line, "So on the mere the wailing died away" (about 270 lines), the two are identical

* * This idyll is merely chs 167, 168 (pt iii) of the History of Prince Arthur, compiled by sir T Malory, put into metre, much being a verbatim rendering

Mortemar (Albionel of), an exiled nobleman, alias Theodorick the hermit of Ingaddi, the enthusiast—Sir W Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I)

Mor'timer (Mr), executor of lord Abberville, and uncle of Frances Tyrrell "He sheathed a soft heart in a rough case" Externally, Mr Mortimer seemed unsympathetic, brusque, and rugged, but in reality he was most benevolent, delicate, and tender-hearted "He did a thousand noble acts without the credit of a single one" In fact, his tongue belied his heart, and his heart his tongue—Cumberland, The Fashionable Lover (1780)

Mortimer (Sir Edward), a most benevolent man, oppressed with some secret sorrow In fact, he knew himself to be a murderer The case was this Being in a county assembly, the uncle of lady Helen insulted him, struck him down, and kicked him Sir Edward rode home to send a challenge to the ruffian, but meeting him on the road drunk, he murdered him, was tried for the crime, but was honourably acquitted He wrote a statement of the case, and kept the papers connected with it in an iron chest One day, Wilford, his secretary, whose curiosity had been aroused, saw the chest unlocked, and was just about to take out the documents when sir Edward entered, and threatened to shoot him, but he relented, made Wilford swear secrecy, and then told him the whole story The young man, unable to live under the jealous eye of sir Edward, ran away, but sir Edward dogged him, and at length arrested him on the charge of robbery The charge broke down, Wilford was acquitted, sir Edward confessed himself a murderer, and died—G Colman, The Lion Chest (1796)

Mortimer Lightwood, solicitor, employed in the "Harmon murder" case He was the great friend of Eugene Wrayburn, barrister-at-law, and it was the ambition of his life to imitate the nonchalance and other eccentricities of his friend At one time he was a great admirer of Bella Wilfer Mr Veneering called him "one of his oldest friends," but Mortimer was never in the merchant's house but once in his life, and resolved never to enter it again—C Dickens, Our Mutual Friend (1864)

Morven ("a ridge of high hills"), in the north-west of Scotland, called in Ossian "windy Morven," "resounding Morven," "echoing Morven," "rocky Morven" Fingal is called indifferently "king of Selma" and "king of Morven" Selma was the capital of Morven Probably it was Argyllshire extended north and east,

Morvidus, son of Danus by his concubine Tangustela. In his reign, there "came from the Irish coasts a most cruel monster, which devoured the people continually, but as soon as Morvidus heard thereof, he ventured to encounter it alone. When all his darts were spent, the monster rushed upon him, and swallowed him up like a small fish."—Geoffrey of Monmouth, British History, iii 15 (1142)

Mosby, an unmitigated villain. He seduced Alicia, the wife of Arden of Faversham. Thrice he tried to murder Arden, but was baffled, and then frightened Alicia into conniving at a most villainous scheme of murder. Pretending friendship, Mosby hired two ruffians to murder Arden while he was playing a game of draughts. The villains, who were concealed in an adjacent room, were to rush on their victim when Mosby said, "Now I take you." The whole gang was apprehended and executed—Arden of Faversham (1592), altered by George Lillo (1739)

Mosca, the knavish confederate of Volpone (2 syl) the rich Venetian "fox"—Ben Jonson, Volpone or The Fox (1605)

If your mother in hopes to ruin me should consent to marry my pretended uncle, he might, like Mosca "in The Fox, stand upon terms."—W. Congreve, The Way of the World II. 1 (1700)

Mosce'ra, a most stately convent built by the abbot Rodulfo, on the ruins of a dilapidated fabric. On the day of opening, an immense crowd assembled, and the abbot felt proud of his noble edifice. Amongst others came St. Gualberto (3 syl), who, when the abbot showed him the pile and the beauty thereof, said in prayer, "If this convent is built for God's glory, may it abide to the end of time, but if it is a monument of man's pride, may that little brook which flows hard by overwhelm it with its waters." At the word, the brook ceased to flow, the waters piled up mountain high, then dashing on the convent overthrew it, nor left one stone upon another, so complete was the ruin.—Southey, St Gualberto

Moscow. So-and-so was my Moscow, that is, the turning-point of my good fortune, leading to future "shoals and misery." The reference is to Napoleon Bonaparte's disastrous Russian expedition, when his star hastened to its "set."

Juan was my Moscow [the ruin of my reputation and fame].

Mo'ses, the Jew money-lender in Sheridan's comedy The School for Scandal (1777)

Moses' Clothes. The Korân says "God cleared Moses from the scandal which was rumored against him" (ch xxxiii). The scandal was that his body was not properly formed, and therefore he would never bathe in the presence of others. One day, he went to bathe, and laid his clothes on a stone, but the stone ran away with them into the camp. Moses went after it as fast as he could run, but the Israelites saw his naked body, and perceived the untruthfulness of the common scandal—Sale, Al Korân, xxxiii notes

Moses' Horns. The Vulgate gives quod cornuta esset facies sua, for what our version has translated "he wist not that the shin of his face shone." The Hebrew word used means both a "horn" and an "irradiation." Michael Angelo followed the Vulgate

Moses' Rod.

While Moses was living with Reuel (Jithro) the Midianite, he noticed a staff in the garden and he took it to be his walking-stick. This staff was Joseph's and Reuel carried it away when he fled from Egypt. This same staff Adam carried with him out of Eden. Noah inherited it and gave it to Shem. It passed into the hands of Abraham and Abraham left it to Isaac and when Jacob fled from his brother's anger into Mesopotamia he carried it in his hand and gave it at death to his son Joseph—The Talmud vi.

Moses Slow of Speech. The tradition is this. One day, Pharaoh was carrying Moses in his arms, when the child plucked the royal beard so roughly that the king, in a passion, ordered him to be put to death. Queen Asia said to her husband, the child was only a babe, and was so young he could not discern between a ruby and a live coal. Pharaoh put it to the test, and the child clapped into his mouth the burning coal, thinking it something good to eat. Pharaoh's anger was appeased, but the child burnt its tongue so severely, that ever after it was "slow of speech"—Shalshele, Ha'habala, 11

Moses Slow of Speech. The account given in the Talmud is somewhat different,

It is therein stated that Pharaoh was sitting one day with Moses on his lap, when the child took the crown from the king's head and placed it on his own. The "wise men" of Egypt persuaded Pharaoh that this act was treasonable, and that the child should be put to death. Jithro [sic] the priest of Midian said it was the act of a child who knew no better. "Let two plates," said he, "be set before the child, one containing gold and the other live coals, and you will presently see that he will choose the coals in preference to the gold." The advice of Jithro being followed, the boy Moses snatched at the coals, and putting one of them into his mouth, burnt his tongue so severely that ever after he was "heavy of speech"—The Talmud, v.

Most Christian King (Le Roy Tres-Christien) The king of France is so called by others, either with or without his proper name, but he never styles himself so in any letter, grant, or rescript.

Mother Hubbard, an old lady whose whole time and attention were taken up by her dog, who was most wilful, but the dame never lost her temper, nor forgot her politeness. After running about all day to supply Master Doggie,

The dame made a curtsy the dog made a bow;
The dame said "Your servant!" the dog said "Bow wow!"

A Nursery Tale in Rhyme

Mother Hubbard, the supposed narrator of a tale called The Fox and the Ape, related to the poet Spenser to beguile the weary hours of sickness. Several persons told him tales, but woman was o did far surpass

it seemed her well;

She when her turn was come her tale to tell
Told of a strange adventure that befell
Letwixt a fox and ape by him misguided.
The which for that my sense it greatly pleased,
I'll write it as she the same did say

Spenser

Mother Hubbard's Tale A fox and an ape determined to travel about the world as chevaliers de l'industrie. First, Ape dressed as a broken-down soldier, and Fox as his servant. A farmer agreed to take them for his shepherds, but they devoured all his lambs and then decamped. They next "went in for holy orders." Reynard contrived to get a living given him, and appointed the ape as his clerk, but they soon made the parish too hot to hold them, and again sheered off. They next tried their fortune at court, the ape set himself up as a foreigner of distinction, with Fox for his groom. They played the part of rakes, but being found to be desperate rogues, had to flee with all despatch, and seek another field of action. As they journeyed on, they saw a lion sleeping, and Master Fox persuaded his companion to steal the crown, sceptre, and royal robes. The ape, arrayed in these, assumed to be king, and Fox was his prime minister, but so ill did they govern that Jupiter interfered, the lion was restored, and the ape was docked of his tail and had his ears cropt.

Since which all apes but half their ears have left,
And of their tails are utterly bereft.
So Mother Hubbard her discourse did end.

Mother's Three Joys (A) "The three holy days allowed to the fond mother's heart," passing by the ecstasy of the birth of her child, are

1 When first the white blossoms of his teeth appear breaking the crimson buds that did encase them that is a day of Joy

2 Next when from his father's arms he runs without support, and clings laughing and delighted to his mother's knee

3 And so stammering
father mother oh that is the dearest Joy of all!
—Sheridan PLarro (altered from Kotzebue 1799)

Mould (M), undertaker. His face had a queer aspect at melancholy, sadly at variance with a smirk of satisfaction which might be read between the lines. Though his calling was not a lively one, it did not depress his spirits, as in the bosom of his family he was the most cheery of men, and to him the "tap, tap" of coffin-making was as sweet and exhilarating as the tapping of a woodpecker — C. Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1844)

Mouldy (Ralph), "a good-limbed fellow, young, strong, and of good friends" Ralph was picked for a recruit in Sir John Falstaff's regiment. He promised Bardolph forty shillings "to stand his friend." Sir John, being told this, sent Mouldy home, and when Justice Shallow remonstrated, saying that Ralph "was the likeliest man of the lot," Falstaff replied, "Will you tell me, Master Shallow, how to choose a man? Care I for the limb, the thews, the stature, bulk, and big assemblance of a man? Give me the spirit, Master Shallow." — Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV act iii sc 2 (1598)

Moullahs, Mohammedan lawyers, from which are selected the judges

Mountain (The), a name given in the French Revolution to a faction which sat on the benches most elevated in the Hall of Assembly. The Girondins sat in the centre or lowest part of the hall, and were nicknamed the "plain." The "mountain" for a long time was the dominant part, it utterly overthrew the "plain" on August 31, 1793, but was in turn overthrown at the fall of Robespierre (9 Thermidor or July 27, 1794)

Mountain (The Old Man of the), the imam Hassan ben Sabbah el Homairi. The sheik Al Jebel was so called. He was the prince of the Assassins.

. In Rymer's Fœdera (vol 1), Dr Clarke, the editor, has added two letters of this sheik, but the doctor must be responsible for their genuineness.

Mountain Brutus (The), William Tell (1282-1350)

Mountain-Monach of Europe, mont Blanc

Mountain of Flowers, the site of the palace of Violenta, the mother fairy who brought up the young princess afterwards metamorphosed into "The White Cat"—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682)

Mountain of Miseries Jupiter gave permission for all men to bring their grievances to a certain plain, and to exchange them with any others that had been cast off. Fancy helped them, but though the heap was so enormous, not one single vice was to be found amongst the rubbish. Old women threw away their wrinkles, and young ones their mole-spots, some cast on the heap poverty, many their red noses and bad teeth, but no one his crimes. Now came the choice. A galley-slave picked up gout, poverty, picked up sickness, care picked up pain, snub noses picked up long ones, and so on. Soon all were bewailing the change they had made, and Jupiter sent Patience to tell them they might, if they liked, resume their own grievances again. Every one gladly accepted the permission, and Patience helped them to take up their own bundle, and bear it without murmuring—Addison, The Spectator (1711, 1712, 1714)

Mountains (Prince of German), Schneekoppe (5235 feet), in Eastern Prussia

Mourning In Colman's Hair-at-Law (1797), every character is in mourning. The Dowlases as relatives of the deceased lord Duberly, Henry Morland as heir of lord Duberly, Steadfast as the chief friend of the family, Dr Pangloss as a clergyman, Caroline Dormer for her father recently buried, Zebiel and Cicely Homespun for the same reason, Kenrick for his deceased master—James Smith, Memoirs (1840)

Mourning Bride (The), a drama by W. Congreve (1697). "The mourning-bride" is Almira daughter of Manuel king of Granada, and her husband was Alphonso prince of Valencia. On the day of their espousals they were shipwrecked, and each thought the other had perished, but they met together in the court of Granada, where Alphonso was taken captive under the assumed name of Osmyn. Osmyn, having effected his escape, marched to Granada at the head of an army, found the king dead, and "the mourning bride" became his joyful wife.

Mouse-Tower (The), on the Rhine. It was here that bishop Hatto was devoured by mice. (See HATTO, p. 429)

Muckworm (Sir Penurious), the miserly old uncle and guardian of Arbella He wants her to marry squire Sapskull, a raw Yorkshire tike, but she loves Gavloce, a young barrister, and, of course, Muckworm is outwitted—Carey, The Honors' Yorkshireman (1736)

Mudarra, son of Gonzalo Bustos de Salas de Lara, who murdered his uncle Rodrigo while hunting, to avenge the death of his seven half-brothers The tale is, that Rodrigo Velasquez invited his seven nephews to a feast, when a fray took place in which a Moor was slain, the aunt, who was a Moorish lady, demanded vengeance, whereupon the seven boys were allured into a ravine and cruelly murdered Mudarra was the son of the same father as "the seven sons of Lara," but not of the same mother—Romance of the Eleventh Century

Muddle, the carpenter under captain Savage and lieutenant O'Brien—Captain Marrant, Peter Simple (1833)

Muddlewick (Triptolemus), in Charles III, an historical drama by J. R. Planché (1826)

Mudjeekeewis, the father of Hiawatha, and subsequently potentate of the winds He gave all the winds but one to his children to rule, the one he reserved was the west wind, which he himself ruled over The dominion of the winds was given to Mudjeeewis because he slew the great bear called the Mishé-Mokwa

Thus was slain the Mishé Mokwa
Honour be to Mudjeeewis
Henceforth he shall be the west wind,

And hereafter e'en for ever
Shall he hold supreme dominion
Over all the winds of heaven.

Longfellow Hiawatha II (1855)

Mug (Matthew), a caricature of the duke of Newcastle — S Foote, The Mayor of Garratt (1768)

Mugello, the giant slain by Alexander de Medici, a commander under Charlemagne. This giant wielded a mace from which hung three balls, which the Medici adopted as their device.

 They have been adopted by pawnbrokers as a symbol of their trade.

Muggins (Dr), a sapient physician, who had the art "to suit his physic to his patients' taste," so when King Artaxaminous felt a little seedy after a night's debauch, the doctor prescribed to his majesty "to take a morning whet" — W B Rhodes, Bombastes Furioso (1790)

Muhldenau, the minister of Mariendorpt, and father of Meeta and Adolpha. When Adolpha was an infant, she was lost in the siege of Magdeburg, and Muhldenau, having reason to suppose that the child was not killed, went to Prague in search of her. Here Muhldenau was seized as a spy, and condemned to death. Meeta, hearing of his capture, walked to Prague to beg him off, and was introduced to the governor's supposed daughter, who, in reality, was Meeta's sister Adolpha. Rupert Roselheim, who was betrothed to Meeta, stormed the prison and released Muhldenau — S Knowles, The Maid of Mariendorpt (1838)

Mulatto, a half-caste. Strictly speaking, Zambo is the issue of an Indian and a Negress, Mulatto, of a Whiteman and a Negress, Terzeron, of a Whiteman and a Mulatto woman, Quadroon, of a Terzeron and a White.

Mulciber, Vulcan, who was blacksmith, architect, and god of fire.

In Ausonian land

Men called him Mulciber and how he fell
From heaven they fabled thrown by angry Jove
Sheer o'er the crystal battlements from morn
To noon he fell from noon to dewy eve
A summer's day and with the setting sun
Dropt from the zenith like a falling star
On Lemnos, the Ægean Ile.

Milton Paradise Lost 739 etc. (1665)

Muley Bugentuf, king of Morocco, a blood-and-thunder hero. He is the chief character of a tragedy of the same name, by Thomas de la Fuenta.

In the first act, the king of Morocco, by way of recreation shot a hundred Moorish slaves with arrows. In the second he beheaded thirty Portuguese officers, prisoners of war, and in the third and last act, Muley mad with his wives, set fire with his own hand to a detached palace in which they were shut up and reduced them all to ashes. This conflagration accompanied with a thousand shrieks closed the piece in a very direct ing manner — Leage, Gill Blas II 9 (1716)

Mull Sack. John Cottington, in the time of the Commonwealth, was so called, from his favourite beverage. John Cottington emptied the pockets of Oliver Cromwell when lord protector, stripped Charles II of £1500, and stole a watch and chain from lady Fairfax.

 Mull sack is spiced sherry negus.

Mulla's Bard, Spenser, author of the Faery Queen. The Mulla, a tributary of the Blackwater, in Ireland, flowed close by the spot where the poet's house stood. He was born and died in London (1553-1599).

Mulmutine Laws, the code of Dumallo Mulmutius, sixteenth king of the Britons (about B.C. 400). This code was translated by Gildas from British into Latin, and by Alfred into English. The Mulmutine laws obtained in this country till the Conquest — Holinshed, History of England, etc., II 1 (1577)

Mulmutius made our laws

Who was the first of Britain which did put His brows within a golden crown and call Himself a king.

Shakespeare Cymbeline act III sc. 1 (1605)

Mulmutius (Dunwallo), son of Cloten king of Cornwall. "He excelled all the kings of Britain in valour and gracefulness of person." In a battle fought against the allied Welsh and Scotch armies, Mulmutius tried the very scheme which Virgil (Æneid, II) says was attempted by Æneas and his companions—that is, they dressed in the clothes and bore the arms of the enemy slain, and thus disguised committed very great slaughter. Mulmutius, in his disguise, killed both the Cambrian and Albanian kings, and put the allied army to thorough rout — Geoffrey, British History, II 17.

* * The name is said to refer to Hieronymus Karl Friedrich von Münch-hausen, a German officer in the Russian army, noted for his marvellous stories (1720-1797). It is also supposed to be an implied satire on the travellers' tales of baron de Tott in his Mémoires sur les Lures et Tartares (1781), and those of James Bruce "The African Traveller" in his Travels to Discover the Sources of the Nile (1790)

Munchausen (The baron) The French baron Munchausen is represented by M de Crae, the hero of a French operetta

Munera, daughter of Pollenté the Saracen, to whom he gave all the spoils he could lay his hands on. Munera was beautiful and rich exceedingly, but Tulus, turned to live with her brother—Dickens,

David Copperfield (1849)

Murray or Moray (The bonnie earl), was son-in-law of James Stuart, the "Good Regent," and called Moray by special creation, in right of his wife. The Regent, born 1531, was a natural son of James V of Scotland by Margaret daughter of John lord
Erskine. He joined the reform party in 1556, was an accomplice in the murder of Rizzio, and was himself assassinated, in 1570, at Lindlithgow, by Hamilton of Bothwell-haugh. His son-in-law, the bonnie earl, was, according to an ancient ballad, "the queen's love," i.e. queen Anne of Denmark, daughter of Frederick II, and wife of James I of England. It is said that James, being jealous of the handsome earl, instigated the earl of Huntly to murder him (1592)

Introduced by sir W. Scott in *The Muscadins of Paris, Paris exquisites, who aped the London cockneys in the first French Revolution. Their dress was top-boots with thick soles, knee-breeches, a dress-coat with long tails and high stiff collar, and a thick eudgel called a constitution. It was thought John Bull-like to assume a huskiness of voice, a discourtesy of manners, and a swaggering vulgarity of speech and behaviour.

Musketeer, a soldier armed with a musket, but specially applied to a company of gentlemen who were a mounted guard in the service of the king of France from 1661

They formed two companies, the grey and the black, so called from the colour of their hair. Both were clad in scarlet, and hence their quarters were called the Maison rouge. In peace they followed the king in the chase to protect him, in war they fought either on foot or horseback. They were suppressed in 1791, restored in 1814, but only for a few months, and after the restoration of Louis XVIII, we hear no more of them. Many Scotch gentlemen enrolled themselves among these dandy soldiers, who went to war with curled hair, white gloves, and perfumed like milliners.

Mushin, the talkative, impertinent, intriguing succubus of Mrs Lovemore. Mistress Mushin is sweet upon William the footman, and loves cards—A Murphy, The Way to Keep Him (1760)

Mussel, a fountain near the waterless sea, which purges from transgression. So called because it is contained in a hollow stone like a mussel-shell. It is mentioned by Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnenus emperor of Constantinople. Those who test it enter the water, and, if they are true men, it rises till it covers their heads three times.

Mustafa, a poor tailor of China, father of Aladdin, killed by illness brought on by the idle vagabondism of his son—Arabian Nights ("Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp")

Mutton, a courtesan, sometimes called a "lauced mutton." "Mutton Lane," in Clerkenwell, was so called because it was a suburb or quarter for harlots. The courtesan was called a "Mutton" even in the reign of Henry III, for Bracton speaks of them as ores—De Legibus, etc., ii (1569)

Mutton (Who Stole the?) This was a common street jeer flung on policemen when the force was first organized, and rose thus. The first case the force had to deal with was the thief of a log of mutton, but they wholly failed to detect the thief, and the laugh turned against them.

Mutton - Eating King (The), Charles II of England (1630, 1659-1685)

Here lies our mutton-eating king
Whose word no man relies on,
He never said a foolish thing
And never did a wise one

Earl of Rochester

Mutual Friend (Our), a novel by Charles Dickens (1864). The "mutual friend" is Mr Boffin "the golden dustman," who was the mutual friend of John Harmon and of Bella Wilfer. The tale is this. John Harmon was supposed to have been murdered by Julius Handford, but it was Ratford, who was murdered by Rogue Riderhood, and the mistake arose from a resemblance between the two persons. By his father's will, John Harmon was to marry Bella Wilfer, but John Harmon knew not the person destined by his father for his wife, and made up his mind to dislike her. After his supposed murder, he assumed the name of John Rokesmith, and became the secretary of Mr Boffin "the golden dustman," residuary legatee of old John Harmon, by which he became possessor of £100,000. Boffin knew Rokesmith, but concealed his knowledge for a time. At Boffin's house, John Harmon (as Rokesmith) met Bella Wilfer, and fell in love with her. Mr Boffin, in order to test Bella's love, pretended to be angry with Rokesmith for presuming to love Bella, and as Bella married him, he cast them both off "for a time," to live on John's earnings. A babe was born, and then the husband took the young mother to a beautiful house, and told her he was John Harmon, that the house was their house, that he was the possessor of £100,000 through the disinterested conduct of their "mutual friend" Mr Boffin, and the young couple live happily with Mr and Mrs Boffin, in wealth and luxury.

My-Book (Dr). Dr John Abernethy (1765-1830) was so called, because he used to say to his patients, "Read my book" (On Surgical Observations)

Myrob'alan Comfits (Greek, muron balanon, "myrrh fruit"), dried fruits of various kinds, sometimes used as purgatives. The citrus resemble the French "prunes de Mirabelle," the belerins have a noyau flavour, the indus are acidulated. There are several other varieties.

She is sweeter to me than the myrob'alan (sic) comfit.
W Beckford Lutheh (1786)

Myrra, an Ionian slave, and the beloved concubine of Sardanapalus the Assyrian king. She roused him from his indolence to resist Arha'cès the Mede who aspired to his throne, and when she found his cause hopeless, induced him to mount a funeral pile, which she fired with her own hand, and then springing into the flames she perished with the tyrant — Byron, Sardanapalus (1819)

At once brave and tender enunured of her lord yet yearning to be free worshipping at once her distant land and the soft barbarian. The heroism of this fair Ionian is never above nature yet always on the highest verge. The proud melancholy that mingles with her character recalling her fatherland her warm and generous love without one tinge of self her passionate desire to elevate the nature of Sardanapalus — are the result of the purest sentiment and the noblest art. — Edward Lytton Bulwer (Lord Lytton)

Mysie, the female attendant of lady Margaret Bellenden of the Tower of Tilhetudlem — Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Mysic, the old housekeeper at Wolf's Crag Tower — Sir W Scott, Lode of Lammemoor (time, William III)

Mysis, the scolding wife of Sile no, and mother of Daph'nè and Nysa. It is to Mysis that Apollo sings that popular song, "Pry, Goody, please to moderate the rancour of your tongue" (act 1 3) — Kane O'Hara, Midas (1764)

Mysterious Husband (The), a tragedy by Cumberland (1783). Lord Davenant was a bigamist. His first wife was Marianne Dormer, whom he forsook in three months to marry Louisa Travers. Marianne, supposing her husband to be dead, married lord Davenant's son, and Miss Dormer's brother was the betrothed of the second lady Davenant before her marriage with his lordship, but was told that he had proved faithless and had married another. The report of lord Davenant's death and the marriage of captain Dormer were both false. When the villainy of lord Davenant could be concealed no longer, he destroyed himself.

N

Nab, the fairy that addressed Orpheus in the infernal regions, and offered him for food a roasted ant, a flea's thigh, butterflies' brains, some sucking mites, a rainbow tart, etc., to be washed down with dew-drops and beer made from seven barley-corns — a very heady liquor — King, Orpheus and Eurydice (1780-1805)

Nab-man (The), a sheriff's officer. Old Dornton has sent the nab man after him at last — Guy Rannering II 3

* * This is the dramatized version of Sir W Scott's novel, by Terry (1816)

Nacien, the holy hermit who introduced Galahad to the "Siege Perilous," the only vacant seat in the Round Table. This seat was reserved for the knight who was destined to achieve the quest of the holy grail. Nacien told the king and his knights that no one but a virgin knight could achieve that quest — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, III (1470)

Nadab, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for lord Howard, a profligate, who laid claim to great piety. As Nadab offered incense with strange fire and was slain, so lord Howard, it is said, mixed the consecrated wafer with some roast apples and sugar — Pt 1 (1681)

Na'dalet, a peculiar peal rung at Christmas-time by the church bells of Languedoc.

Christmas is coming which is announced on all sides of us by our charming na'dalet — Cornhill Magazine (Eugénie de Guérin 1863)

Nadgett, a man employed by Montague Tigg (manager of the "Anglo-Bengalee Company") to make private inquiries. He was a dried-up, shrivelled old man. Where he lived and how he lived, nobody knew, but he was always to be seen writing for some one who never appeared, and he would glide along apparently taking no notice of any one — C Dickens, Mr. Fin C. Wooler (1843)

Nags Head Consecration, a scandal perpetuated by Pennant on the dogma of "apostolic succession." The "high-church clergy" assert that the ceremony called holy orders has been transmitted without interruption from the apostles. Thus, the apostles laid hands on certain persons, who (say they) became ministers of the gospel; the persons "ordained" others in the same manner, and the succession has never been broken. Pennant says, at the consecration the bishops came to a fix. There was only one bishop viz., Anthony Kichen of Llandaf, and he would not allow him to perform the ceremony. In this predicament, the father of a candidate for episcopal ordination rummaged his story, and used his shop, and got him to "lay hand on Parker, as archbishop of Canterbury." As it would have been profanation for Story to do this in a cathedral or church, the ceremony was performed in a tavern called the Nag's Head, corner of Friday Street. Churchward Streyer takes the scandalous tale in his Life of Archbishop Parker, and so does Dr. Hook, but it will never be stamped out.

Naggleton (Mr and Mrs) types of a nagging husband and wife. They are for ever nagging at trifles and waffling in understandings. — Punch (1861-2)

Naked Bear (The) Hunt the Wild Deer with a threat and reproof to unruly children in North America. The naked bear says the legend was larger and more ferocious than any of the species. It was quite naked, save and except one spot on its back, where was a tuft of white hair — Hildebender, Travels in the American Wild, p. 269

It had white hair on its back

Nakar', Nekar, or Nakeer (See MOKEER AND NAKIP)

Nala, a legendary king of India, noted for his love of Damayanti and his subsequent misfortunes. This legendary king has been the subject of numerous poems.

* * * Dean Milman has translated into English the episode from the Mahabharata, and W. Yates has translated the Nalodaya of the great Sanskrit poem.

Nama, a daughter of man, beloved by the angel Zaraph. Her wish was to love intensely and to love wholly, but as she fixed her love on a scraph, and not on God, she was doomed to abide on earth "unchanged in heart and frame so long as the earth endureth, but at the great consummation both Nama and her scraph will be received into those courts of love, where 'love never dieth' — Moon, Leaves of the Banyan, p. 1822

Namaneos, Numantia, a town of Old Castile, in Spain. Milton says the "guarded mount looks towards Namaneos," that is, the fortified mount called St. Michael, at the head of the bay, faces Old Castle — Milton, Lucifer, l. 161 (1665)

Namby (Major), a retired officer, living in the suburbs of London. He had been twice married, his first wife had four children, and his second wife three. Major Namby, though he lived in a row, always transacted his domestic affairs by bawling out his orders from the front garden, to the annoyance of his neighbours. He used to staid half way down the garden path, with his head high in the air, his chest stuck out, and flourishing his military cane. Suddenly he would stop, stamp with one foot, knock up the leader brim of his hat, begin to scratch the nape of his neck, wait a moment, then wheel round, look at the first-floor window, and roar out, "Matilda" (the name of his wife) "don't do so-and-so," or "Matilda do so-and-so." Then would he bellow to the servants to buy this or not to let the children eat that, and so on — Wilkie Collins, Prize Employ Major Namby (a sketch)

Name To tell one's name to an enemy about to challenge you to combat was deemed by the ancient Scotch heroes a mark of cowardice, because, if the predecessors of the combatants had shown hospitality, no combat could ensue. Hence "to tell one's name to an enemy" was an ignominious synonym of craven or coward.

I have been renowned in battle — said Claverhouse — but I never told my name to a foe — Claverhouse

* * A similar story is told of Nômanal-Aôuar king of Hirah, who employed Senna'mar to build him a palace. When finished, he cast the architect headlong from the highest tower, to prevent his building another to rival it—D Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale (1697)

Nekayah, sister of Rasselas prince of Abyssinia. She escapes with her brother from the "happy valley," and wanders about with him to find what condition or rank of life is the most happy. After roaming for a time, and finding no condition of life free from its drawbacks, the brother and sister resolve to return to the "happy valley"—Dr Johnson, Rasselas (1759)

Nell, the meek and obedient wife of Jobson, taught by the strap to know who was lord and master. Lady Loverule was the immortal, headstrong bride of sir John Loverule. The two women, by a magical hocus-poocus, were changed for a time, without any of the four knowing it. Lady Loverule was placed with Jobson, who soon brought down her turbulent temper with the strap, and when she was reduced to submission, the two women were restored again to their respective husbands—C Coffey, The Devil to Pay (1731)

The merit of Mrs. Nell (1711-1785) as an actress first showed itself in "Nell" the cobbler's wife.—T Davies.

Nell (Little) or NEILA TRFNT, a sweet, innocent, loving child of 14 summers, brought up by her old miserly grandfather, who gambled away all his money. Her days were monotonous and without youthful companionship, her evenings gloomy and solitary, there were no child-sympathies in her dreary home, but dejection, despondence akin to madness, watchfulness, suspicion, and imbecility. The grandfather being wholly ruined by gaming, the two went forth as beggars, and ultimately settled down in a cottage adjoining a country churchyard. Here Nelly died, and the old grandfather soon afterwards was found dead upon her grave—C Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop (1840)

* * The solution of the grandfather's story is given in ch lxx.

Ne'mo, the name by which captain Hawdon was known at Krook's. He had once won the love of the future lady Dedlock, by whom he had a child called Esther Summerson, but he was compelled to copy law-writings for daily bread, and died a miserable death from an overdose of opium—C Dickens, Bleak House (1852)

Nepen'the (3 syl) or NEPENTHES, a care-dispelling drug, which Polydamna, wife of Tho'nis king of Egypt gave to Helen (daughter of Jove and Leda). A drink containing this drug "changed grief to mirth, melancholy to joyfulness, and hatred to love." The water of Ardenne had the opposite effects. Homer mentions the drug nepenthes in his Odyssey, iv 228,

That repent's whil's the wife of Thome
In Egypt gave to Jove her Helen.
Milton, Comus 675 (1634)

Nepent's is a drink or sovereign grace
Devised by the gods for to allure
Heart a grief and bitter gall away to chase
While I run up anger and contentious rage
In trial thereof sweet peace and quiet rage
It doth establish in the troubled mind
And to him drink eternal happiness do find Epilogue Fury Queen l. 2 (1651)

Neph'elo-Coccygia, the cloud-land of air castles. The word means "cuckoo cloudland." The city of Nephelo-Coccygia was built by cuckoos and gulls, and was so fortified by clouds that the gods could not meddle with the affairs of its inhabitants — Aristophanes, The Birds.

* * The name occurs also in Lucian's Verba Historice.

Will you bring to Neph'elo-Coccygia or to the court of queen Mab, we can meet with sharper, hotter, more delicate and women worthy of such paragonage — Merry.

Nep'omuk or Nep'omuck (S' John), canon of Prague. He was thrown from a bridge in 1381, and drowned by order of King Wenceslaus, because he refused to betray the secrets confided to him by the queen in the holy rite of confession. The spot whence he was cast into the Moldau is still marked by a cross with five stars on the parapet, indicative of the miraculous flames seen flickering over the dead body for three days. Nepomuk was canonized in 1729, and became the patron saint of bridges. His statue in stone usually occupies a similar position on bridges as it does at Prague.

With all the vehemence and speed of wing
Campden, Lured 11 (1655).

Nerissa, the clever confidential waiting-woman of Portia the Venetian heiress. Nerissa is the counterfeiter of her mistress, with a fair share of the lady's elegance and wit. She marries Gratiano a friend of the merchant Anthonio — Shakespeare, The Merchant of Venice (1638).

Nero of the North, Christian II of Denmark (1180, reigned 1531-1558, died 1559).

Nesle (Blondel de), the favourite minstrel of Richard Cœur de Lion [Nesle = Nesle] — Sir W. Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I).

Nessus's Shirt. Nessus (in Latin Nessus), the centaur, carried the wife of Hercules over a river, and attempting to run away with her, was shot by Hercules. As the centaur was dying, he told Deianira (3 syl) that if she steeped in his blood her husband's shirt, she would secure his love for ever. Thus she did, but when Hercules put the shirt on, his body suffered such agony, that he rushed to mount Ota, collected together a pile of wood, set it on fire, and, rushing into the midst of the flames, was burnt to death.

When Creusa (3 syl), the daughter of King Cronus, was about to be married to Jason, Medea sent her a splendid wedding robe, but when Creusa put it on, she was burnt to death by it in excruciating pain.

Morgan le Fay, hoping to kill King Arthur, sent him a superb royal robe. Arthur told the messenger to try it on, that he might see its effect, but no sooner had the messenger done so, than he dropped down dead, "burnt to mere coal." — Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 175 (1470).

For 'ho! the shirt of Nessus is upon me [i.e. I am in agony].
Shakespeare Antony and Cleopatra act IV sc. 10 (1609).

Nestor (A), a wise old man. Nestor of Pylos was the oldest and most experienced of all the Greek chieftains who went to the siege of Troy — Homer, Iliad.

Nestor of the Chemical Revolution Dr Black is so called by Lavoisier (1728-1799)

Nestor of Europe, Leopold king of Belgium (1790, 1831-1865)

Neu'ha, a native of Toobouai, one of the Society Islands. It was at Toobouai that the mutineers of the Bounty landed, and Torquil married Neuha. When a vessel was sent to capture the mutineers, Neuha conducted Torquil to a secret cave, where they lay perdu till all danger was over, when they returned to their island home — Byron, The Island (The character of Neuha is given in canto ii 7)

New Way to Pay Old Debts, a drama by Philip Massinger (1625). Wellborn, the nephew of sir Giles Overreach, having run through his fortune and got into debt, induces lady Allworth, out of respect and gratitude to his father, to give him countenance. This induces sir Giles to suppose that his nephew was about to marry the wealthy dowager. Feeling convinced that he will then be able to swindle him of all the dowager's property, as he had ousted him out of his paternal estates, sir Giles pays his nephew's debts, and supplies him liberally with ready money, to bring about the marriage as soon as possible. Having paid Wellborn's debts, the overreaching old man is compelled, through the treachery of his clerk, to restore the estates also, for the deeds of conveyance are found to be only blank sheets of parchment, the writing having been erased by some chemical acids.

New Zealander It was Macaulay who said the time might come when some "New Zealand artist shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London bridge to sketch the ruins of St Paul's."

* Shelley was before Macaulay, in the same conceit — See Dedication of Peter Bell the Third.

Newcastle (The duchess of), in the court of Charles II — Sir W. Scott, Fervor of the Peal (time, Charles II).

Newcastle (The marquis of), a royalist in the service of Charles I — Sir W. Scott, Legend of Montrose (time, Charles I).

Newcastle Apothecary (The), Mr Bolus of Newcastle used to write his prescriptions in rhyme. A bottle bearing the couplet, "When taken to be well shaken," was sent to a patient, and when Bolus called next day to inquire about its effect, John told the apothecary his master was dead. The fact is, John had shaken the sic man instead of the bottle, and had shaken the life out of him — G. Colman, junior.

Newcome (Clemency), about 30 years old, with a plump and cheerful face, but twisted into a tightness that made it comical. Her gait was very homely, her limbs seemed all odd ones, her shoes were so self-willed that they never wanted to go where her feet went. She wore blue stockings, a printed gown of hideous pattern and many colours, and a white apron. Her sleeves were short, her elbows always grazed, her cap anywhere but in the right place, but she was scrupulously clean, and "maintained a kind of dislocated tidiness." She carried in her pocket "a handkerchief, a piece of wax-candle, an apple, an orange, a lucky penny, a crump-bone, a padlock, a pair of scissors, a handful of loose beads, several balls of worsted and cotton, a needle-case, a collection of curl-papers, a biscuit, a thimble, a nutmeg-grater, and a few miscellaneous articles." Clemency Newcome married Benjamin Britain, her fellow-servant at Dr Jeddler's, and opened a country inn called the Nutmeg-Grater, a cozy, well-to-do place as any one could wish to see, and there were few married people so well assorted as Clemency and Ben Britain — C. Dickens, The Battle of Life (1846).

Newcome (Colonel), a widower, distinguished for the moral beauty of his life. He loses his money and enters the Charter House.

Clive Newcome, his son. He is in love with Ethel Newcome, his cousin, whom he marries as his second wife — Thackeray, The Newcomes (1850).

Newcome (Johnny), any raw youth when he first enters the army or navy.

Newgate Fashion (To March), two and two, as the prisoners were at one time conveyed to Newgate two and two together.

Falstaff. Must we all march?
Shakespeare. Yes, two and two. Newgate fashion.
Shakespeare. 1 Henry IV, act III, sc. 3 (1497).

Newgate Tringe, a beard worn only under the chin, as the hangman's rope is fastened round the neck of those about to be hanged. Sometimes called the Newgate Frill, and sometimes the Tyburn Collar.

The Newgate Knocker, a lock of hair worn especially by costermongers, twisted towards the ear. It is supposed to remind one of the knocker on the prison door of Newgate. The cow-hel is a curl worn on the temples.

Newland (Abraham), one of the governors of the Bank of England, to whom, in the early part of the nineteenth century, all Bank of England notes were made payable. A bank-note was called an "Abraham Newland," and hence the popular song, "I've often heard say, sham Abraham you may, but must not sham Abraham Newland."

Trees are notes issued from the bank of nature, and as current as those payable to Abraham Newland — G. Colman. The Poor Gentleman 1 (1850-7).

Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night.

God said: Let Newton be, and all was light.

Pope Epitaph intended for Newton's Monument in Westminster Abbey (1727)

Newton is called by Campbell "The Priest of Nature"—Pleasures of Hope, 1 (1799)

Newton and the Apple It is said that Newton was standing in the garden of Mrs Conduitt of Woolsthorpe, in the year 1665, when an apple fell from a tree and set him thinking. From this incident he ultimately developed his theory of gravitation.

Nibelung, a mythical king of Nibelungenland (Norway). He had twelve paladins, all giants. Siegfried [Sege-freod], prince of the Netherlands, slew the giants, and made Nibelungenland tributary.—Nibelungen Lied, iii (1210)

Nibelungen Hoard, a mythical mass of gold and precious stones, which Siegfried [Sege-freod], prince of the Netherlands, took from Nibelungenland and gave to his wife as a dowry. The hoard filled thirty-six waggons. After the murder of Siegfried, Hagan seized the hoard, and, for concealment, sank it in the "Rhine at Lockham," intending to recover it at a future period, but Hagan was assassinated, and the hoard was lost for ever.—Nibelungen Lied, xiv.

Nibelungen Lied [No by-lung 'n lād], the German Iliad (1210). It is divided into two parts, and thirty-two lieds or cantos. The first part ends with the death of Siegfried, and the second part with the death of Kriemhild.

Siegfried, the youngest of the kings of the Netherlands, went to Worms, to crave the hand of Kriemhild in marriage. While he was staying with Günther king of Burgundy (the lady's brother), he assisted him to obtain in marriage Brunhild queen of Issland, who announced publicly that he only should be her husband who could beat her in hurling a spear, throwing a huge stone, and in leaping. Siegfried, who possessed a cloak of invisibility, aided Günther in these three contests, and Brunhild became his wife. In return for these services, Günther gave Siegfried his sister Kriemhild in marriage. After a time, the bride and bridegroom went to visit Günther, when the two ladies disputed about the relative merits of their respective husbands, and Kriemhild, to exalt Siegfried, boasted that Günther owed to him his victories, and his wife Brunhild, in great anger, now employed Hagan to murder Siegfried, and this he did by stabbing him in the back while he was drinking from a brook.

Thirteen years elapsed, and the widow married Etzel king of the Huns. After a time, she invited Brunhild and Hagan to a visit. Hagan, in this visit, killed Etzel's young son, and Kriemhild was like a fury. A battle ensued, in which Günther and Hagan were made prisoners, and Kriemhild cut off both their heads with her own hand. Hildebrand, horrified at this act of blood, slew Kriemhild, and so the poem ends.—Authors unknown (but the story was pieced together by the minnesingers).

* * The Volsunga Saga is the Icelandic version of the Nibelungen Lied. This saga has been translated into English by William Morris.

The Nibelungen Lied has been ascribed to Heinrich von Otfendingen, a minnesinger, but it certainly existed before that epoch, if not as a complete whole, in separate lays, and all that Heinrich von Otfendingen could have done was to collect the floating lays, connect them, and form them into a complete story.

F. A. Wolf, in 1795, wrote a learned book to prove that Homer did for the Iliad and Odyssey what Otfendingen did for the Nibelungenlied.

Richard Wagner composed, in 1850, an opera called Die Nibelungen.

Nibelungen Nôt, the second part of the Nibelungen Lied, containing the marriage of Kriemhild with Etzel, the visit of the Burgundians to the court of the Hun, and the death of Günther, Hagan, Kriemhild, and others. This part contains eighty-three four-line stanzas.

more than the first part The number of lines in the two parts is 9836, so that the poem is almost as long as Milton's Paradise Lost

Nibelungers, whoever possessed the Nibelungen hoard When it was in Norway, the Norwegians were so called when Siegfried [Sage freed] got the possession of it, the Netherlands were so called, and when the hoard was removed to Burgundy, the Burgundians were the Nibelungers

Nice (Sir Courtly), the chief character and title of a drama by Croune (1685)

Nicholas, a poor scholar, who boarded with John, a rich old miserly carpenter The poor scholar fell in love with Alison, his landlord's young wife, who joined him in duping the foolish old carpenter Nicholas told John that such a rain would fall on the ensuing Monday as would drown every one in "less than an hour," and he persuaded the old fool to provide three large tubs, one for himself, one for his wife, and the other for his lodger In these tubs, said Nicholas, they would be saved, and when the flood abated, they would then be lords and masters of the whole earth A few hours before the time of the "flood," the old carpenter went to the top chamber of his house to repeat his pater noster He fell asleep over his prayers, and was roused by the cry of "Water! water! Help! help!" Supposing the rain had come, he jumped into his tub, and was let down by Nicholas and Alison into the street A crowd soon assembled, were delighted at the joke, and pronounced the old man an idiot and fool — Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Miller's Tale," 1388)

Nickleby (Nicholas), the chief character and title of a novel by C Dickens (1838) He is the son of a poor country gentleman, and has to make his own way in the world He first goes as usher to Mr Squeers, schoolmaster at Dotheboys Hall, in Yorkshire, but leaves in disgust with the tyranny of Squeers and his wife, especially to a poor boy named Smike Smike runs away from the school to follow Nicholas, and remains his humble follower till death At Portsmouth, Nicholas joins the theatrical company of Mr Crummles, but leaves the profession for other adventures He falls in with the brothers Cherryble, who make him their clerk, and in this post he rises to become a merchant, and ultimately marries Madeline Bray

Mrs Nickleby, mother of Nicholas, and a widow She is an enormous talker, fond of telling long stories with no connection Mrs Nickleby is a weak, vain woman, who imagines an idiot neighbour is in love with her because he tosses cabbages and other articles over the garden wall In conversation, Mrs Nickleby rides off from the main point at every word suggestive of some new idea As a specimen of her sequence of ideas, take the following example — "The name began with 'B' and ended with 'G,' I am sure Perhaps it was Waters" (p 198)

* * "The original of 'Mrs Nickleby,'" says John Foster, "was the mother of Charles Dickens"—Life of Dickens, in 8

Kate Nickleby, sister of Nicholas, beautiful, pure-minded, and loving Kate works hard to assist in the expenses of housekeeping, but shuns every attempt of Ralph and others to allure her from the path of virgin innocence She ultimately marries Frank, the nephew of the Cheeryble brothers

Ralph Nickleby, of Golden Square (London), uncle to Nicholas and Kate A hard, grasping money-broker, with no ambition but the love of swindling, no spirit beyond the thirst of gold, and no principle except that of fleecing every one who comes into his power This villain is the father of Smike, and ultimately hangs himself, because he loses money, and sees his schemes one after another burst into thin air—C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Nightingale and the Lutist The tale is, that a lute-master challenged a nightingale in song The bird, after sustaining the contest for some time, feeling itself outdone, fell on the lute, and died broken-hearted

* * This tale is from the Latin of Strada, translated by Richard Crashaw, and called Mus's Duel (1650) It is most beautifully told by John Ford, in his drama entitled The Lover's Melancholy, where Men'aphon is supposed to tell it to Amethus (1628)

Nightingale and the Thorn

Nimrod, pseudonym of Charles James Apperley, author of The Chase, The Road, The Wolf (1777-1843)

Nim'ue, a "damsel of the lake," who cajoled Merlin in his dotage to tell her the secret "whereby he could be rendered powerless," and then, like Delilah, she overpowered him, by "confusing him under a stone"

Then after these quests Merlin fell in a dotage on one of the damsels of the lake light Nimue and Merlin world let her have no rest but always he would be with her in every place. And she made him good cheer till she had learned of him what she desired. And Merlin showed to her in a rock, whereas was a great wonder which went under a stone. So by her subtle craft, she made Merlin go under that stone and he never came out for the craft that he could do—Sir T Malory History of Prince Arthur L 60 (1470)

Without doubt the name Nimue is a clerical error for Nineve or Nimve. It occurs only once in the three volumes (See NINEVE)

* * Tennyson makes Vivien the seductive betrayer of Merlin, and says she enclosed him "in the four walls of a hollow tower," but the History says "Nimue put him under the stone" (pt 1 60)

Nina-Thoma, daughter of Tor-Thoma (chief of one of the Scandinavian islands). She eloped with Uthal (son of Larthmor a petty king of Berrathon, a neighbouring island), but Uthal soon tired of her, and, having fixed his affections on another, confined her in a desert island. Uthal, who had also dethroned his father, was slain in single combat by Ossian, who had come to restore the deposed monarch to his throne. When Nina-Thoma heard of her husband's death, she languished and died, "for though most cruelly entreated, her love for Uthal was not abated"—Ossian, Berathon

Nine "It is by nines that Eastern presents are given, when they would extend their magnificence to the highest degree." Thus, when Dakianos wished to ingratiate himself with the shah,

He caused himself to be preceded by nine superb camels. The first was loaded with nine suits of gold adorned with jewels; the second bore nine sabres the hilts and scabbards of which were adorned with diamonds; upon the third camel were nine suits of armour; the fourth had nine suits of horse furniture; the fifth had nine cases full of sapphires; the sixth had nine cases full of rubies; the eighth had nine cases full of diamonds; the ninth had nine cases full of pearls. Nine Planets (The) Mercury, Venus, the Earth, Mars, the Planetoids, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune

* * According to the Ptolemaic system, there are only seven planets, or more strictly speaking, "planetary heavens," viz, the Moon, Mercury, Venus, the Sun, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. Beyond these were three other spheres, that of the fixed stars, the primum mobile, and the empyrean. This is the system Dante follows in his Paradise

Nine Worthies (The) Three were pagans Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar. Three were Jews Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabæus. Three were Christians Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon

Nine Worthies (privy councillors to William III) Four were Whigs Devonshire, Dorset, Monmouth, and Edward Russell. Five were Tories Caermarthen, Pembroke, Nottingham, Marlborough, and Lowther

No Song no Supper, a musical drama by Prince Hoare, F S A (1790). Crop the farmer has married a second wife called Dorothy, who has an amiable weakness for a rascally lawyer named Endless. During the absence of her husband, Dorothy provides a supper for Endless, consisting of roast lamb and a cake, but just as the lawyer sits down to it, Crop, with Margaretta, knocks at the door. Endless is concealed in a sack, and the supper is carried away. Presently, Robin the sweetheart of Margaretta arrives, and Crop regrets there is nothing but bread and cheese to offer him. Margaretta now volunteers a song, the first verse of which tells Crop there is roast lamb in the house, which is accordingly produced, the second verse tells him there is a cake, which is produced also, and the third verse tells him that Endless is concealed in a sack. Had there been no song there would have been no supper, but the song produced the roast lamb and new cake.

Norman, a "sea-captain," in love with Violet the ward of lady Arundel. It turns out that this Norman is her ladyship's son by her first husband, and heir to the title and estates, but lady Arundel, having married a second husband, had a son named Percy, whom she wished to make her heir. Norman's father was murdered, and Norman, who was born three days afterwards, was brought up by Onslow, a village priest. At the age of 14 he went to sea, and became captain of a man-of-war. Ten years later, he returned to Arundel, and though at first his mother ignored him, and Percy flouted him, his noble and generous conduct disarmed hostility, and he not only reconciled his half-brother, but won his mother's affection, and married Violet, his heart's "sweet sweeting"—Lord Lytton, The Sea-Captain (1839)

And Thræcias read the woods, and seas upturn.
Milton, Paradise Lost x 635 (1663)

* * "Samoed shore," the shore contiguous to the frozen ocean, "Boreas," north wind, "Cæcias," north-west wind, "Argæstæ," north-east wind, "Thræcias," wind from Thrace

Norval (Old), a shepherd, who brings up lady Randolph's son (Douglas) as his own. He was hidden at birth in a basket, because sir Malcolm (her father) hated Douglas, whom she had privately married. The child being found by old Norval, was brought up as his own, but the old man discovered that the foundling was "sir Malcolm's heir and Douglas's son." When 18 years old, the foster-son saved the life of lord Randolph. Lady Randolph took great interest in the young man, and when old Norval told her his tale, she instantly perceived that the young hero was in fact her own son.

Pathos rendered the voice of William Bensley (1733-1817) in Old Norval rugged as well as repulsive, and he never as to his feet, either stood or walked with the character of age. His helpless action had a character of restrained sorrow he implored pity in the noisy shout of defiance.—London

Young Norval, the infant exposed, and brought up by the old shepherd as his own son. He turned out to be sir Malcolm's heir. His mother was lady Randolph, and his father lord Douglas, her first husband. Young Norval, having saved the life of lord Randolph, was given by him a commission in the army. Glenalvon, the heir-presumptive of lord Randolph, hated the new favourite, and persuaded his lordship that the young man was too familiar with lady Randolph. Being waylaid, Norval was attacked, slew Glenalvon, but was in turn slain by lord Randolph. After the death of Norval, lord Randolph discovered that he had killed the son of his wife by a former marriage. The mother, in her distraction, threw herself headlong from a lofty precipice, and lord Randolph went to the war then raging between Denmark and Scotland.—J. Home, Douglas (1757)

(This was a favourite character with John Kemble, 1757-1823.)

Henry Johnston selected Young Norval for his maiden part. His youthful form and handsome expressive countenance won for him universal approbation. Previously the young shepherd had been dressed in the trowsers and Scottish jacket, but when Johnston appeared in full Highland costume—kilt, breastplate, shield, claymore and bonnet, the whole house rose en masse and such a reception was never witnessed within the walls of a provincial theatre before.—W. Donaldson, Recollections

Norway (The Fair Maid of), Margaret, granddaughter of Alexander III of Scotland. She died (1290) of sickness on her passage from Norway to Scotland. Her father was Eric II king of Norway, and her mother was Margaret only daughter of Alexander III.

Nose (Golden), Tycho Brahe, the Danish astronomer. Having lost his nose in a duel with one Passberg, he adopted a golden one, and attached it to his face by a cement which he carried about with him.

That eminent man who had a golden nose Tycho Brahe lost his nose in a duel and a golden one was supplied which gave him the appearance of a wizard.—Marryat Jutland and the Danish Isles 305

Nosebag (Mrs), wife of a lieutenant in the dragoons. She is the inquisitive travelling companion of Waterley, when he travels by stage to London.—Sir W. Scott, Waterley (time, George II.)

Nosey (Play up)! This exclamation was common in our theatres in the days of Macklin, etc. M. Nozay was the leader of the orchestra in Covent Garden Theatre.

* * Some persons affirm that "Old Nosey" was Cervetto, the violoncello player at Drury Lane (1753), and say that he was so called from his long nose.

Napoleon III was nicknamed Grosbois ("Nosey").

Nosnot-Bocai [Bo' ky], prince of purgatory.

Sir I last night received command
To see you out of Fairy land
Into the realm of Nosnot-Bocai

Nostradamus (Michael), an astrologer of the sixteenth century, who published an annual Almanac and a Recueil of Prophecies, in verse (1503-1566).

Nostradamus of Portugal, Gonçalo Annês Bandarra, a poet-cobbler, whose career was stopped, in 1556, by the Inquisition.

Nottingham (The countess of), a quondam sweetheart of the earl of Essex, and his worst enemy when she heard that he had married the countess of Rutland. The queen sent her to the Tower to ask Essex if he had no petition to make, and the earl requested her to take back a ring, which the queen had given him as a pledge of merey in time of need. As the countess out of jealousy forbore to deliver it, the earl was executed.—Henry Jones, The Earl of Essex (1745).

Nottingham Lambs (The), the Nottingham roughs

Nottingham Poet (The), Philip James Bailey, the author of Festus, etc (1816-)

No'tus, the south wind, Afer is the south-west wind

Notus and Afer black with thundrous clouds.
Milton Paradise Lost x. 702 (1603)

Noukhal, the angel of day and night

The day and night are trusted to my care I hold the day in my right hand and the night in my left and I maintain the just equilibrium between them for if either were to overbalance the other the universe would either be consumed by the heat of the sun or would perish with the cold of darkness—Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales (History of Abdal Metallah "1743)

Nouman (Sidi), an Arab who married Aminé, a very beautiful woman, who ate her rice with a bodkin Sidi, wishing to know how his wife could support life and health without more food than she partook of in his presence, watched her narrowly, and discovered that she was a ghou, who went by stealth every night and feasted on the fresh-buried dead When Sidi made this discovery, Aminé changed him into a dog After he was restored to his normal shape, he changed Aminé into a mare, which every day he rode almost to death—Arabian Nights ("History of Sidi Nouman")

Your majesty knows that ghouls of either sex are demons which wander about the fields. They commonly inhabit ruinous buildings whence they issue suddenly on unwary travellers whom they kill and devour If they fail to meet with travellers they go by night into burying grounds, and dig up dead bodies on which they feed.—History of Sidi Nouman "

Noureddin, son of Khacan (vizier of Zinebi king of Balsora) He got possession of the "beautiful Persian" purchased for the king At his father's death he soon squandered away his patrimony in the wildest extravagance, and fled with his beautiful slave to Bagdad Here he encountered Haroun Alraschid in disguise, and so pleased the caliph, that he was placed in the number of those courtiers most intimate with his majesty, who also bestowed on him so plentiful a fortune, that he lived with the "beautiful Persian" in affluence all the rest of his life—Arabian Nights ("Noureddin and the Beautiful Persian")

Nour'eddin' Ali, younger son of the vizier of Egypt "He was possessed of as much merit as can fall to the lot of man " Having quarrelled with his elder brother, he travelled to Basora, where he married the vizier's daughter, and succeeded his father-in-law in office. A son was born to him in due time, and on the very same day the wife of his elder brother had a daughter Nouredin died when his son was barely twenty and unmarried—Arabian Nights ("Nouredin Ali," etc)

Nourgehan's Bracelet Nourgehan emperor of the Moguls had a bracelet which had the property of discovering poison, even at a considerable distance When poison was anywhere near the wearer, the stones of the bracelet seemed agitated, and the agitation increased as the poison approached them—Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans," 1743)

Nour'jahad, a sleeper, like Rip van Winkle, Epimenides, etc (See SLEEPERS) A romance by Mrs Sheridan (1767)

Nourjaham ("light of the world") So the sultana Nourmahal was subsequently called—T Moore, Lalla Rookh ("The Light of the Haram," 1817)

Nourmahal' (The sultana), i. e. "Light of the Haram," afterwards called Nourjaham ("light of the world") She was for a season estranged from the sultan, till he gave a grand banquet, at which she appeared in disguise as a lute-player and singer The sultan was so enchanted with her performance, that he exclaimed, "If Nourmahal had so played and sung, I could forgive her all," whereupon the sultana threw off her mask, and Selim "caught her to his heart"—T Moore, Lalla Rookh ("The Light of the Haram," 1817)

Nouron'ihar, daughter of the emir Fakreddin, a laughing, beautiful girl, full of fun and pretty mischief, dotingly fond of Gulchenrouz, her cousin, a boy of 13 She married the caliph Vathek, with whom she descended into the abyss of Eblis, whence she never after returned to the light of day

The trick she played Bababalouk was this Vathek the caliph was on a visit to Fakreddin the emir, and Bababalouk his chief eunuch intruded into the bath-room, where Nouronihar and her damsels were bathing Nouronihar induced the old eunuch to rest himself awhile on the swing, when the girls set it going with all their might The cords broke, the eunuch fell into the bath, the girls made off with their lamps, and left the meddlesome old fool to flounder about till morning, when assistance came, but not before he was half dead —W Beekford, Vathek (1784)

Nouroun'nihar, niece of a sultan of India, who had three sons all in love with her. The sultan said he would give her to him who, in twelve months, gave him the most valuable present. The three princes met in a certain inn at the expiration of the time, when one prince looked through a tube, which showed Nourounnihar at the point of death, another of the brothers transported all three instantaneously on a magic carpet to the princess's chamber, and the third brother gave her an apple to smell of, which effected an instant cure. It was impossible to decide which of these presents was the most valuable, so the sultan said he should have her who shot in arrow to the greatest distance. The eldest (Houssem) shot first, Ali overshot the arrow of his elder brother, but that of the youngest brother (Ahmed) could nowhere be found. So the award was given to Ali —Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Pari-Banou")

Novel (Father of the English) Henry Fielding is so called by sir W Scott (1707-1754)

November or Blot-month, i.e. "blood month," meaning the month in which oxen, sheep, and swine were slaughtered, and afterwards salted down for winter use. Some idea may be formed of the enormous stores provided, from the fact that the elder Spencer, in 1327, when the season was over, had a surplus, in May, of "80 salted beeves, 500 bacon, and 600 muttons." In Chichester the October fair is called "Slo-fair," i.e. the fair when beasts were sold for the slaughter of Blot-month (Old English, slean sloh, "to slaughter")

Noven'dial Ashes, the ashes of the dead just consigned, or about to be consigned, to the grave. The Romans kept the body seven days, burnt it on the eighth, and buried the ashes on the ninth.

A Noven'dial holiday, nine days set apart by the Romans, in expiation of a shower of stones.

Noven'siles (4 syl), the nine Sabine gods viz, Heracles, Romulus, Esculapius, Bacchus, Antas, Vesta, Santa, Fortuna, and Fides or Faith. (See NINE Gods of the Iturians)

Novit (Mrs Nicht), the lawyer of the old laird of Dumbiedikes —Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Novius, the usurer, famous for the loudness of his voice at hic si plastra dacentia

Concurrantque foro tria funera magna sonabit
Cornua quod vinctaque lubas
Horace Satires L 6

The people seem to be of the race of Novius that Roman banker whose voice exceeded the noise of carmen —Leage Oil Blas vii. 13 (1733)

Now-now (Old Anthony), an itinerant fiddler. The character is a skit on Anthony Munday, the dramatist. —Chettle, Kindheart's Dream (1592)

Nuath (2 syl), father of Lathmon and Oithonai (q v) —Ossian, Oithona

Nubbles (Mrs), a poor widow woman, who was much given to going to Little Bethel

Christopher or Kit Nubbles, her son, the servant in attendance on little Nell, whom he adored. After the death of little Nell, Kit married Barbara, a fellow-servant —C Dickens, The Old Curiosity Shop (1840)

Nudo'si, small stones, which prevent the sight of those who carry them about their person from winking dim. They will even restore the sight after it is lost or impaired. The more these stones are gazed on, the keener will be the gazer's vision. Prester John, in his letter to Manuel Comnenus emperor of Constantinople, says they are found in his country.

Nugget. The largest ever found
1 The Sarah Sands nugget, found at Ballarat. It weighed 130 lbs troy or 1560 oz. Thus, at £1 per ounce, would be worth £210

2 The Blanche Barilly nugget, dug up at Kingover. It weighed 145 lbs, and was worth £6960

3 The Welcome nugget, found at Ballarat. It weighed 184 lbs, and was sold for £10,000. This was the largest ever found.

* * The first nugget was discovered in New South Wales, in 1851, the next in Victoria, in 1852. The former of these two weighed a hundredweight, and was purchased of a shepherd for £10

Numbers The symbolism of the first thirteen numbers

- 1 symbolizes the unity of the Godhead.
- 2 symbolizes the hypostatic union of Christ.
- 3 symbolizes the Trinity.
- 4 symbolizes the Evangelists.
- 5 symbolizes the five wounds (two in the hand, two in the feet, and one in the side)
- 6 is the number of sin.
- 7 is that of the gifts of the Spirit (For 1. 12) Seven times Christ spoke on the cross.
- 8 is the number of the beatitudes (Matt 5. 3-11)
- 9 is the number of the orders of angels (2 P 1)
- 10 is the number of the commandments.
- 11 apostles after the loss of Judas.
- 12 the original apostolic college
- 13 the complete apostolic college after the call of St. Paul.

Nûn, the fish on which the faithful feed in paradise. The lobes of its liver will suffice for 70,000 men. The ox provided for them is called Balam.

Nun's Tale (The), the tale of the cock and the fox. One day, dan Pussell, the fox, came into the poultry-yard, and told Master Chanteclere he could not resist the pleasure of hearing him sing, for his voice was so divinely ravishing. The cock, pleased with this flattery, shut his eyes and began to crow most lustily, whereupon dan Rus-sell seized him by the throat, and ran off with him. When they got to the wood, the cock said to the fox, "I would recommend you to eat me at once, for I think I can hear your pursuers." "I am going to do so," said the fox, but when he opened his mouth to reply, off flew the cock into a tree, and while the fox was deliberating how he might regain his prey, up came the farmer and his men with scythes, flails, and pitchforks, with which they despatched the fox without mercy.—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales (1338)

* * This fable is one of those by Marie of France, called Don Coc and Don Werpil

Nun's Tale (The Second) This is the tale about Maxime and the martyrs Valerian and Tiburee. The prefect ordered Maxime (2 syl) to put Valerian and Tiburee to death, because they refused to worship the image of Jupiter, but Maxime showed kindness to the two Christians, took them home, became converted and was baptized. When Valerian and Tiburee were put to death, Maxime declared that he saw angels come and carry them up to heaven, whereupon the prefect caused him to be beaten to death with whips of lead.—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales (1338)

* * This tale is very similar to that of St Cecilia in the Legenda Aurea. See also Acts xvi 25-34

Nupkins, mayor of Ipswich, a man who has a most excellent opinion of himself, but who, in all magisterial matters, really depends almost entirely on Jinks, his half-starved clerk.—C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Nushka (i.e. "look!"), the cry of young men and maidens of North American Indian tribes when they find a red ear of maize, the symbol of wedlock

And where'er some lucky maiden
Found a red ear in the bucking
Nushka "cried they altogether
Nushka! you shall have a sweetheart,
You shall have a handsome husband!"
Longfellow Hiawatha xiii. (1855)

Nut-Brown Maid (The), the maid wooed by the "banished man." The "banished man" describes to her the hardships she would have to undergo if she married him, but finding that she accounted these hardships as nothing compared with his love, he revealed himself to be an earl's son, with large hereditary estates in Westmoreland, and married her.—Percy, Reliques, II

This ballad is based on the legendary history of lord Henry Clifford, called "The Shepherd Lord." It was modernized by Prior, who called his version of the story Henry and Emma. The oldest form of the ballad extant is contained in Arnolde's Chronicle (1502)

Nutshell (The Iliad in a) George P. Marsh tells us he had seen the whole Korân in Arabic inscribed on a piece of parchment four inches wide and half an inch in diameter. In any photographer's shop may be seen a page of the Times newspaper reduced to about an inch long, and three-quarters of an inch in breadth, or even to smaller dimensions. Charles Toppin, of New York, engraved on a plate one-eighth of an inch square 12,000 letters. The Iliad contains 201,930 letters, and would, therefore, require forty-two such plates, both sides being used. Huet, bishop of Avranches, wrote eighty verses of the Iliad on a spire equal to that occupied by a single line of this dictionary. Thus written, 2000 lines more than the entire Iliad might be contained in one page. The Toppin engraving would require only one of these columns for the entire Iliad.

So that when Pliny (Natural History, vii 21) says the whole Iliad was written on a parchment which might be put into a nutshell, we can credit the possibility, as, by the Toppian process, the entire Ilad might be engraved on less than half a column of this dictionary, provided both sides were used (See ILIAN, p 458)

Nym, corporal in the army, under captain sir John Falstaff, introduced in The Merry Wives of Windsor and in Henry V, but not in Henry IV. It seems that lieutenant Peto had died, and given a step to the officers under him. Thus ensign Pistol becomes lieutenant, corporal Bardolph becomes ensign, and Nym takes the place of Bardolph. He is an arrant rogue, and both he and Bardolph are hanged (Henry V). The word means to "puller"

It would be difficult to give any other name save that of corporal Nym—it was the name of the corporal in the army.

Nymphidia a mock-heroic by Drayton. The fury Pigwidgeon is so gallant to queen Mab as to arouse the jealousy of King Oberon. One day, coming home and finding his queen absent, Oberon vows vengeance on the gallant, and sends Puck to ascertain the whereabouts of Mab and Pigwidgeon. In the mean time, Nymphidia gives the queen warning, and the queen, with all her maids of honour, creep into a hollow nut for concealment. Puck, coming up, sets foot in the enchanted circle which Nymphidia had charmed, and, after tumbling about for a time, tumbles into a ditch. Pigwidgeon, seconded by Tomalin, encounters Oberon seconded by Tom Thum, and the fight is "both fast and furious." Queen Mab, in alarm, craves the interference of Proserpine, who first envelops the combatants in a thick smoke, which compels them to desist, and then gives them a draught "to assuage their thirst." The draught was from the river Lethe, and immediately the combatants had tasted it, they forgot not only the cause of the quarrel, but even that they had quarrelled at all.—M. Drayton, Nymphidia (1593)

Nysa, daughter of Sileno and Mysis, and sister of Daphne. Justice Midas is in love with her, but she loves Apollo, her father's guest.—Kane O'Hara, Midas (1761)

Nysé, Doto, and Neri-né, the three nereids who went before the fleet of Vasco da Gama. When the treacherous pilot steered the ship of Vasco towards a sunken rock, these three sea-nymphs lifted up the prow and turned it round.—Camoens, Lusiad, ii (1569)

O

O (Our Lady of) The Virgin Mary is so called in some old Roman rituals, from the ejaculation at the beginning of the seven anthems preceding the Magnificat, as "O when will the day arrive?" "O when shall I see?" "O when?" and so on

Oak. The Romans gave a crown of oak leaves to him who saved the life of a citizen

In a cruel war I sent him from whence he returned his brow bound with oak.—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, act I. sc. 3 (1779)

Oakly (Major), brother to Mr Oakly, and uncle to Charles. He assists his brother in curing his "jealous wife"

Mr Oakly, husband of the "jealous wife." A very amiable man, but deficient in that strength of mind which is needed to cure the idiosyncrasy of his wife, so he obtains the assistance of his brother, the major

Mrs Oakly, "the jealous wife" of Mr Oakly. A woman of such suspicious temper, that every remark of her husband is distorted into a proof of his infidelity. She watches him like a tiger, and makes both her own and her husband's life utterly wretched

Charles Oakly, nephew of the major. A fine, noble-spirited young fellow, who could never stand by and see a woman insulted, but a desperate debauchee and drunkard. He aspires to the love of Harriot Rascel, whose influence over him is sufficiently powerful to reclaim him.—George Colman, The Jealous Wife (1761)

Oates (Dr Titus), the champion of the popish plot.—Sir W Scott, Perceval of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Forth came the no longer Dr Oates rustled in the tall silken carobals of priest-hood for he affected no small display of exterior decoration and I deplore it. His exterior was portentous. A sleeve of white periwig showed a most uncouth visage of great length, having the mouth placed in the very centre of the countenance and exhibiting to the reverend spectator a most horrible grin. Below a there was nose and brow above it. His pronunciation was after a concealed fashion of his own in which he rendered the words in a manner altogether peculiar to himself.—Ch. XII

Knight, The Honest Thieves (died 1820)

This farce is a mere réchauffé of The Committee (1670), a comedy by the Hon-sir R Howard, the names and much of the conversation being identical. Colonel Blunt is called in the farce "captain Manly."

Every play goer must have seen Munden (1759-1832) in Obadiah, in The Committee or Honest Thieves. If not they are to be pitied.—Mrs C Mathews Tea Table Talk.

Munden was one night playing Obadiah and Jack Johnstone, as "Teague" was plying him with liquor from a black bottle. The grimaces of Munden were so irresistibly comical, that not only did the house shriek with laughter but Johnstone himself was too convulsed to proceed. When Obadiah was borne off he shouted,

Where's the villain that filled that bottle? Lamp oil!
Lamp oil! every drop of it! The fact is the property man had given the bottle of lamp oil instead of the bottle filled with sherry and writer Johnstone asked Munden why he had not given him a hint of the mistake and Munden replied "There was such a glorious roar at the Obermann, the impersonation of high moral worth without talent, and the tortures endured by the consciousness of this defect.—Etienne Pivert de Senancourt, Obermann (1804)

Oberon, king of the faeries, quarrelled with his wife Titania about a "change-ling" which Oberon wanted for a page, but Titania refused to give up Oberon, in revenge, mortified her eyes in sleep with the extract of "Love in Idleness," the effect of which was to make the sleeper in love with the first object beheld on waking. Titania happened to see a country bumpkin, whom Puck had dressed up with an ass's head.
Oberon came upon her while she was fondling the clown, sprinkled on her an antidote, and she was so ashamed of her folly that she readily consented to give up the boy to her spouse for his page.—
Shakespeare, Midsummer Night's Dream

Oberon the Fay, king of Mommur, a humpy dwarf, three feet high, of angelic face. He told sir Huon that the Lady of the Hidden Isle (Cephalonia) married Neptanctibus king of Egypt, by whom she had a son named Alexander
"the Great." Seven hundred years later she had another son, Oberon, by Julius Cesar, who stopped in Cephalonia on his way to Thessaly. At the birth of Oberon, the faeries bestowed their gifts on him. One was insight into men's thoughts, and another was the power of transporting himself instantaneously to any place. At death, he made Huon his successor, and was borne to paradise.—
Huon de Bordeaux (a romance)

Oberthal (Count), lord of Dordrecht, near the Meuse.—When Bertha, one of his vassals, asked permission to marry John of Leiden, the count withheld his consent, as he designed to make Bertha his mistress. This drove John into rebellion, and he joined the anabaptists. The count was taken prisoner by Giona, a discarded servant, but was liberated by John. When John was crowned prophesying, the count entered the banquet-hall to arrest him, and perished with him in the flames of the burning palace.—Meyerbeer, Le Prophète (opera, 1819)

Obi. Among the negroes of the West Indies, "Obi" is the name of a magical power, supposed to affect men with all the curses of an "evil eye."

Obi-Woman (An), an African sorceress, a worshipper of Mumbo Jumbo.

Obi'dah, a young man who meets with various adventures and misfortunes allegorical of human life.—Dr Johnson, The Rambler (1750-2)

Oblivion, the fiend of lust, and one of the five which possessed "poor Tom"—Shakespeare, King Lear, act iv sc 1 (1600)

O'Brallaghan (Sir Callaghan), "a wild Irish soldier in the Prussian army. His military humour makes one fancy he was not only born in a siege, but that Bellona had been his nurse, Mars his schoolmaster, and the Furies his playfellows" (act i 1). He is the successful sutor of Charlotte Goodchild.—Macklin, Love à-la-mode (1759)

Oceana, an ideal republic, on the plan of Plato's Atlantis. It represents the author's notion of a model commonwealth.—James Harrington, Oceana (1656)

Ochiltree (Old Edie), a king's bedesman or blue-gown. Edie is a garrulous, kind-hearted, wandering beggar, who assures Mr Lovel that the supposed ruins of a Roman camp is no such thing. The old bedesman delighted "to daunder down the burnsidies and green shaws." He is a well-drawn character.—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Ocnus (The Rope of), profitless labour. Ocnus is represented as twisting with unwearied diligence a rope, which an ass eats as fast as it is made. The allegory signifies that Ocnus worked hard to earn money, which his wife spent by her extravagance.

Octa, a mountain from which the Latin poets say the sun rises.

Octave (2 syl), the son of Argante (2 syl). During the absence of his father, Octave fell in love with Hyacinthe daughter of Geronte, and married her, supposing her to be the daughter of signior Pandolphe of Tarentum. His father wanted him to marry the daughter of his friend Geronte, but Octave would not listen to it. It turned out, however, that the daughter of Pandolphe and the daughter of Geronte were one and the same person, for Geronte had assumed the name of Pandolphe while he lived in Tarentum, and his wife and daughter stayed behind after the father went to live at Naples.—Molière, Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671).

* * In the English version, called The Cheats of Scapin, by Thomas Otway, Octave is called "Octavian," Argante is called "Thrifty," Hyacinthe is called "Clara," and Geronte is "Gripe."

Octavian, the lover of Floranthé. He goes mad because he fancies that Floranthé loves another, but Roque, a blunt, kind-hearted old man, assures him that doña Floranthé is true to him, and induces him to return home.—Colman the younger, The Mountaineers (1793)

Odour of Sanctity To die "in the odour of sanctity" did not mean simply in "good repute" It was a prevalent notion that the dead body of a saint positively emitted a sweet-smelling savour, and the dead body of the unbaptized an offensive smell

Then he smote off his head and therewithall came a stench out of the body when the soul departed so that there might nobody abide the savour So was the corpse laid away and buried in a wood because he was a pagan.

Then the naughty prince said unto sir Palluelier Here have ye seen this day a great miracle by sir Lancelot what savour there was when the soul departed from the body therefore we require you for to take the holy baptism

Odyssey Homer's epic, recording the adventures of Odysseus (Ulysses) in his voyage home from Troy

Book I The poem opens in the island of Calypso, with a complaint against Neptune and Calypso for preventing the return of Odysseus (3 syl) to Ithaca.

II Telemachus, the son of Odysseus, starts in search of his father, accompanied by Pallas in the guise of Mentor

III Goes to Pylus, to consult old Nestor, and

IV Is sent by him to Sparta, where he is told by Menelaos that Odysseus is detained in the island of Calypso

V In the mean time, Odysseus leaves the island, and, being shipwrecked, is cast on the shore of Phœacia,

VI Where Nausicaa, the king's daughter, finds him asleep, and

VII Takes him to the court of her father Alcinoos, who

VIII Entertains him hospitably

IX At a banquet, Odysseus relates his adventures since he started from Troy. Tells about the Lotus-eaters and the Cyclops, with his adventures in the cave of Polyphemos. He tells how

X The wind-god gave him the winds in a bag. In the island of Circe, he says, his crew were changed to swine, but Mercury gave him a herb called Moly, which disenchanted them

XI He tells the king how he descended into hades,

XII Gives an account of the sirens, of Scylla and Charibdis, and of his being cast on the island of Calypso

XIII Alcinoos gives Odysseus a ship which conveys him to Ithaca, where he assumes the disguise of a beggar,

XIV And is lodged in the house of Eumæos, a faithful old domestic

XV Telemachus, having returned to Ithaca, is lodged in the same house,

XVI And becomes known to his father

XVII Odysseus goes to his palace, is recognized by his dog Argos, but

XVIII The beggar Iros insults him, and Odysseus breaks his jaw-bone

XIX While bathing, the returned monarch is recognized by a scar on his leg,

XX And when he enters his palace, becomes an eye-witness to the disorders of the court, and to the way in which

XXI Penelope is pestered by suitors. To excuse herself, Penelope tells her suitors he only shall be her husband who can bend Odysseus's bow. None can do so but the stranger, who bends it with ease. Concealment is no longer possible or desirable,

XXII He falls on the suitors hip and slings,

XXIII Is recognized by his wife,

XXIV Visits his old father Laërtes, and the poem ends

Offa, king of Mercia, was the son of Thingferth, and the eleventh in descent from Woden. Thus Woden, (1) his son Wihlreg, (2) his son Warrmund, (3) Offa I, (4) Angelthow, (5) Iomer, (6) Icel, (7) Pybba, (8) Osmod, (9) Inwulf, (10) Thingferth, (11) Offa, whose son was Egbert who died within a year of his father. His daughter, Iadburga, married Bertie king of the West Saxons, and after the death of her husband, she went to the court of king Charlemagne. Offa reigned thirty-nine years (755-791)

Offa's Dyke, a dyke from Beaulieu to Hampshire, repaired by Offa king of Mereia, and used as a rough boundary of his territory. Asser, however, says

There was in Mereia (A.D. 855) a certain valiant king who was feared by all the kings and neighbouring states around. His name was Offa. He it was who had the great rampart made from sea to sea between Britain and Mercia.

O'Flaherty (Dennis), called "major O Flaherty." A soldier, says he, is "no livery for a knave," and Ireland is "not the country of dishonour." The major pays court to old lady Rusport, but when he detects her dishonest purposes in bribing her lawyer to make away with sir Oliver's will, and cheating Charles Dudley of his fortune, he not only abandons his suit, but exposes her dishonesty. —Cumberland, The West Indian (1771)

Og, king of Basan. Thus saith the rabbis

The height of his stature was 23 033 cubits [nearly six miles]. He used to drink water from the clouds and toast fish by holding them before the orb of the sun. He asked Noah to take him into the ark, but Noah would not. When the flood was at its deepest, it did not reach to the knees of this giant. Og lived 3000 years, and then was slain by the hand of Moses.

Moses was him ell ten cubits in stature [fifteen feet], and he took a spear ten cubits long, and threw it ten cubits high, and yet it only reached the heel of Og. When dead, his body reached as far as the river Nile in Egypt.

Og's mother was Enac, a daughter of Adam. Her fingers were two cubits long [one yard], and on each finger she had two sharp nails. She was devoured by wild beasts. —Barabod

In the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, Thomas Shadwell, who was a very large man, is called "Og."

O'gier the Dane, one of the paladins of the Charlemagne epoch. When 100 years old, Morgue the fay took him to the island of Avalon, "hard by the terrestrial paradise," gave him a ring which restored him to ripe manhood, a crown which made him forget his past life and introduced him to King Arthur. Two hundred years afterwards, she sent him to defend France from the pagans, who had invaded it, and having routed the invaders, he returned to Avalon again. —Ogier le Danois (a romance)

In a pack of French cards, Ogier the Dane is knave of spades. His exploits are related in the Chansons de Geste, he is introduced by Ariosto in Orlando Furioso, and by Morris in his Earthly Paradise ("August")

O'gleby (Lord), an old fop, vain to excess, but good-natured withal, and quite the slave of the fair sex, were they but young and fair. At the age of 70, his lordship fancied himself an Adonis, notwithstanding his qualms and his rheumatism. He required a great deal of "brushing, oiling, screwing, and winding up before he appeared in public," but, when fully made up, was game for the part of "lover, rake, or fine gentleman." Lord O'gleby made his bow to Fanny Sterling, and promised to make her a countess, but the young lady had been privately married to Lovewell for four months. —Colman and Garrick, The Clandestine Marriage (1766)

No one could deliver such a dialogue as is found in Lord O'gleby and in Sir Peter Teazle. [School for Scandal. Sheridan] with such point as Thomas King [1739-1800]. —Life of Sheridan

O'Groat (John), with his two brothers, Malcolm and Gavin, settled in Caithness in the reign of James IV. The families lived together in harmony for a time, and met once a year at John's house. On one occasion a dispute arose about precedence — who was to take the head of the table, and who was to go out first. The old man said he would settle the question at the next annual muster, accordingly he made as many doors to his house as there were families, and placed his guests at a round table.

Oig M'Combich (Robin) or M'Gregar, a Highland drover, who quarrels with Harry Wakefield an English drover, about a pasture-field, and stabs him. Being tried at Carlisle for murder, Robin is condemned to death. —Sir W. Scott, The Two Drovers (time, George III.)

Oina-Morul, daughter of Mal-Orchol king of Fuirfed (a Scandinavian island). Ton-Thormod asked her in marriage, and being refused by the father, made war upon him. Ingal sent his son Ossian to the aid of Mal-Orchol, and he took Ton-Thormod prisoner. The king now offered Ossian his daughter to wife, but the warrior-bard discovered that the lady had given her heart to Ton-Thormod, whereupon he resigned his claim, and brought about a happy reconciliation —

Ossian, Oma-Morut

Oith'ona, daughter of Nuath, betrothed to Gaul son of Morni, and the day of their marriage was fixed, but before the time arrived, I'ngal sent for Gaul to aid him in an expedition against the Britons. Gaul promised Oithona, if he survived, to return by a certain day. Lathmon, the brother of Oithona, was called away from home at the same time, to attend his father on an expedition, so the damsel was left alone in Dunlathmon. It was now that Dunrommath lord of Uthral (one of the Orkneys) came and carried her off by force to Trom'athon, a desert island where he concealed her in a cave. Gaul returned on the day appointed, heard of the rape, sailed for Trom'athon, and found the lady, who told him her tale of woe, but scarcely had she ended when Dunrommath entered the cave with his followers. Gaul instantly fell on him, and slew him. While the battle was raging, Oithona, arrayed as a warrior, rushed into the thickest of the fight, and was slain. When Gaul had cut off the head of Dunrommath, he saw what he thought a youth dying of a wound, and taking off the helmet, perceived it was Oithona. She died, and Gaul returned disconsolate to Dunlathmon — Ossian, Oithona

Okba, one of the sorcerers in the caves of Dom-Daniel "under the roots of the ocean." It was decreed by fate that one of the race of Hoder'nali (3 syl) would be fatal to the sorcerers, so Okba was sent forth to kill the whole race both root and branch. He succeeded in cutting off eight of them, but Thal'aba contrived to escape. Abdaldar was sent to hunt down the survivor, but was himself killed by a simoom.

Curse on thee Okba! Khawla cried

Old Age restored to Youth
The following means are efficacious —

The fontaine de jouvence, "qui fit rajeunir la gent," the fountain of Bi'mini, the river of juvenescence at the foot of Olympus, the dancing water, presented by prince Chery to Fairstar, the broth of Medea, etc

We are also told of grinding old men into young. Ogier, at 100 years old, was restored to the vigour of manhood by a ring given him by Morgue the fay. And Hebt had the power of restoring youth and beauty to whom she chose —

Old Bags John Scott, lord Eldon, so called because he carried home with him in sundry bags the cases pending his judgment (1751-1838)

Old Bona Fide (2 syl), Louis XIV (1638, 1648-1715)

Old Curiosity Shop (The), a tale by C Dickens (1840). An old man, having run through his fortune, opened a curiosity shop in order to earn a living, and brought up a granddaughter, named Nell [Trent], 14 years of age. The child was the darling of the old man, but deluding himself with the hope of making a fortune by gaming, he lost every thing, and went forth, with the child, a beggar. Their wanderings and adventures are recounted till they reach a quiet country village, where the old clergyman gives them a cottage to live in. Here Nell soon dies, and the grandfather is found dead upon her grave. The main character next to Nell is that of a lad named Kit [Nubbles], employed in the curiosity shop, who adored Nell as "an angel." This boy gets in the service of Mr Garland, a genial, benevolent, well-to-do man, in the suburbs of London, but Quilp hates the lad, and induces Brass, a solicitor of Bevis Marks, to put a £5 bank-note in the boy's hat, and then accuse him of theft. Kit is tried, and condemned to transportation, but the villainy being exposed by a girl-of-all-work nicknamed "The Marchioness," Kit is liberated and restored to his place, and Quilp drowns himself.

Old Harry, the devil. The Hebrew seraph ("hairy ones") is translated "devils" in Lev xvii 7, probably meaning "he-goats"

Old Hickory. General Andrew Johnson was so called in 1813. He was first called "Tough," then "Tough as Hickory," then "Hickory," and lastly "Old Hickory."

Old Humphrey, the pseudonym of George Mognridge of London (died 1851)

Old Maid (The), a farce by Murphy (1761). Miss Harlow is the "old maid," aged 45, living with her brother and his bride a beautiful young woman of 23. A young man of fortune, having seen them at Ranelagh, falls in love with the younger lady, and, inquiring their names, is told they are "Mrs and Miss Harlow." He takes it for granted that the elder lady is the mother, and the younger the daughter, so asks permission to pay his addresses to "Miss Harlow." The request is granted, but it turns out that the young man meant Mrs Harlow, and the worst of the matter is, that the elder spinster was engaged to be married to captain Cape, but turned him off for the younger man, and, when the mistake was discovered, was left like the last rose of summer to "pine on the stem," for neither felt inclined to pluck and wear the flower.

Old Maids, a comedy by S Knowles (1811). The "old maids" are lady Blanche and lady Anne, two young ladies who resolve to die old maids. Their resolutions, however, are but ropes of sand, for lady Blanche falls in love with colonel Blount, and lady Anne with sir Philip Brilliant.

Old Moll, the beautiful daughter of John Overie or Audery (contracted into Overs) a miserly ferryman. "Old Moll" is a standing toast with the parish officers of St. Mary Overs.

Old Mortality, the best of Scott's historical novels (1816). Morton is the best of his young heroes, and serves as an excellent foil to the fanatical and gloomy Burley. The two classes of actors, viz, the brave and dissolute cavaliers, and the resolute oppressed covenanters, are drawn in bold relief. The most striking incidents are the terrible encounter with Burley in his rocky fastness, the dejection and anxiety of Morton on his return from Holland, and the rural comfort of Cuddie Headrigg's cottage on the banks of the Clyde, with its thin blue smoke among the trees, "showing that the evening meal was being made ready."

Old Mortality always appeared to me the Milton of Scott's novels. — Chambers' English Literature II 52

Oldbuck (Jonathan), the antiquary, devoted to the study and accumulation of old coins and medals, etc. He is fastidious, irritable, and a woman-hater, but kind-hearted, faithful to his friends, and a humorist—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time George III.)

An excellent temper with a slight degree of subdroll humor, learning wit and drollery, the more poignant that they were a little marked by the peculiarities of an old bachelor—a soundness of thought rendered more forcible by an occasional quaintness of expression—these were the qualities in which the creature of my imagination most resembled my benevolent and excellent old friend—Sir W. Scott.

The merit of The Antiquary as a novel rests on the inimitable delineation of Oldbuck, that model of black letter and Roman-camp antiquaries, whose oddities and conversation are rich and racy as any of the old crusty port that John of the Girdle might have held in his monastic cellars.—Chambers, English Literature ii 636

Olifant, the horn of Roland or Orlando. This horn and the sword "Durinda'na" were buried with the hero. Turpin tells us in his Chronicle that Charlemagne heard the blare of this horn at the distance of eight miles

Olifant (Basil), a kinsman of lady Margaret Bellenden, of the Tower of Tilthetndlem—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II.)

Olifaunt (Lord Nigel), of Glenvarloch. On going to court to present a petition to James I, he aroused the dislike of the duke of Buckingham. Lord Dalgarno gave him the cut direct, and Nigel struck him, but was obliged to seek refuge in Alsatin. After various adventures, he married Margaret Ramsay, the watchmaker's daughter, and obtained the title-deeds of his estates—Sir W. Scott, The Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.)

Olum'pia, the wife of Bireno, uncompromising in love, and relentless in hate—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Olum'pia, a proud Roman lady of high rank. When Rome was sacked by Bourbon, she flew for refuge to the high altar of St. Peter's, where she clung to a golden cross. On the advance of certain soldiers in the army of Bourbon to seize her, she cast the huge cross from its stand, and as it fell it crushed to death the foremost soldier. Others then attempted to seize her, when Arnold dispersed them and rescued the lady, but the proud beauty would not allow the foe of her country to touch her, and hung herself from the high altar on the pavement. Apparently lifeless, she was borne off, but whether she recovered or not we are not informed, as the drama was never finished—Byron, The Deformed Transformed (1821)

Olindo, the lover of Sophronia. Aladine king of Jerusalem, at the advice of his magicians, stole an image of the Virgin, and set it up as a palladium in the chief mosque. During the night it was carried off, and the king, unable to discover the thief, ordered all his Christian subjects to be put to death. To prevent this massacre, Sophronia delivered up herself as the perpetrator of the deed, and Olindo, hearing thereof, went to the king and declared Sophronia innocent, as he himself had stolen the image. The king commanded both to be put to death, but by the intercession of Clorinda they were both set free —Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, iii (1575)

Oliphant or Ollyphant, the twin-brother of Argan'tè the giantess. Their father was Typhæus, and their mother Iarhi —Spenser, Fairy Queen, iii 7, 11 (1590)

Olive, emblem of peace. In Greece and Rome, those who desired peace used to carry an olive branch in their hand (see Gen viii 11)

Olive Tree (The), emblem of Athens, in memory of the famous dispute between Minerva (the patron goddess of Athens) and Neptune. Both deities wished to found a city on the same spot, and referring the matter to Jove, the king of gods and men decreed that the privilege should be granted to whichever would bestow the most useful gift on the future inhabitants. Neptune struck the earth with his trident, and forth came a war-horse, Minerva produced an olive tree, emblem of peace, and Jove gave the verdict in favour of Minerva.

Oliver, the elder son of sir Rowland de Boys [Bovor], left in charge of his younger brother Orlando, whom he hated and tried indirectly to murder. Orlando, finding it impossible to live in his brother's house, fled to the forest of Arden, where he joined the society of the banished duke. One morning, he saw a man sleeping, and a serpent and lioness bent on making him their prey. He slew both the serpent and the lioness, and then found that the sleeper was his brother Oliver. Oliver's disposition from this moment underwent a complete change, and he loved his brother as much as he had before hated him. In the forest, the two brothers met Rosalind and Celia. The former, who was the daughter of the banished duke, married Orlando, and the latter, who was the daughter of the usurping duke, married Oliver —Shakespeare, As You Like It (1598)

Oliver le Dain or Oliver le Diable, court harber, and favourite minister of Louis XI. Introduced by sir W. Scott in Quentin Durward and Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.)

Olivia, a rich countess, whose love was sought by Orsino, duke of Illyria, but having lost her brother, Olivia lived for a time in entire seclusion, and in no wise reciprocated the duke's love, in consequence of which Viola nicknamed her "Fair Cruelty." Strange as it may seem, Olivia fell desperately in love with Viola, who was dressed as the duke's page, and sent her a ring. Mistaking Sebastian (Viola's brother) for Viola, she married him out of hand —Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (1611)

Never were Shakespeare's words more finely given than by Miss M. Tree (1860, 1861) in the speech to Olivia, beginning "Make me a willow cabin at thy gate." —Talfourd (1811)

Olivia, a female Tartuffe (2 syl.), and consummate hypocrite of most unblushing effrontery —Wicherly, The Plain Dealer (1677)

The dnc de Montausier was the prototype of Wicherly's "Mr Manly," the "plain dealer," and of Molière's "Misanthrope."

Olivia, daughter of sir James Woodville, left in charge of a mercenary wretch, who, to secure to himself her fortune, shut her up in a convent in Paris. She was rescued by Leontine Crouker, brought to England, and became his bride —Goldsmith, The Good-natured Man (1768)

Olivia, the tool of Ludovico. She loved Vicentio, but Vicentio was plighted to Evadne, sister of Colonna. Ludovico induced Evadne to substitute the king's miniature for that of Vicentio, which she was accustomed to wear. When Vicentio returned, and found Evadne with the king's miniature, he believed what Ludovico had told him, that she was the king's wanton, and he cast her off. Olivia repented of her duplicity, and explained it all to Vicentio, whereby a reconciliation took place, and Vicentio married his truth-plighted lady "more sinned against than sinning"—Shiel, Deadne or The Statue (1820)

Olivia, "the rose of Aragon," was the daughter of Ruyh'no, a peasant, and bride of prince Alonzo of Aragon. The king refused to recognize the marriage, and, sending his son to the army, compelled the cortex to pass an act of divorce. Thus brought to a head a general revolt. The king was dethroned, and Almagro made regent. Almagro tried to make Olivia marry him, ordered her father to the rack, and her brother to death. Meanwhile the prince returned at the head of his army, made himself master of the city, put down the revolt, and had his marriage duly recognized. Almagro took poison and died.—S Knowles, The Rose of Aragon (1842)

Olivia [PRIMROSE], the elder daughter of the vicar of Wakefield. She was a sort of Hebe in beauty, open, sprightly, and commanding. Olivia Primrose "wished for many lovers," and eloped with squire Thornhill. Her father went in search of her, and, on his return homeward, stopped at a roadside inn, called the Harrow, and there found her turned out of the house by the landlady. It was ultimately discovered that she was legally married to the squire.—Goldsmith, Vicar of Wakefield (1765)

Olivia de Zuniga, daughter of don Cesar. She fixed her heart on having Julio de Melessina for her husband, and so behaved to all other suitors as to drive them away. Thus to don Garcia, she pretended to be a termagant, to don Vincentio, who was music mad, she professed to love a Jew's-harp above every other instrument. At last Julio appeared, and her "bold stroke" obtained as its reward "the husband of her choice."—Mrs Cowley, A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1782)

Olla, bard of Cairbar. These bards acted as heralds.—Ossian

Ollapod (Cornet), at the Galen's Head. An eccentric country apothecary, "a jumble of phisic and shooting." Dr Ollapod is very fond of "wit," and when he has said what he thinks a smart thing, he calls attention to it, with "He! he! he!" and some such expression as, "Do you take, good sir? do you take?" But when another says a smart thing, he titters, and cries, "That's well! that's very well! Thank you, good sir, I owe you one!" He is a regular rattle, details all the scandal of the village, boasts of his achievements or misadventures, is very mercenary, and wholly without principle.—G Colman, The Poor Gentleman (1802)

* * This character is evidently a copy of Dibdin's "doctor Pother" in The Farmer's Wife (1780)

Ollomand, an enchanter, who persuaded Abu'bal, the rebellious brother of Misnar sultan of Delhi, to try by bribery to corrupt the troops of the sultan. By an unlimited supply of gold, he soon made himself master of the southern provinces, and Misnar marched to give him battle. Ollomand, with 5000 men, went in advance and concealed his company in a forest, but Misnar, apprized thereof by spies, set fire to the forest, and Ollomand was shot by the discharge of his own cannons, fired spontaneously by the flames. "For enchantment has no power except over those who are first deceived by the enchanter."—Sir C Morell [J Ridley], Tales of the Genii ("The Enchanter's Tale," vi, 1751)

Olof (Sir), a bridegroom who rode late to collect guests to his wedding. On his ride, the daughter of the earl king met him, and invited him to dance a measure, but sir Olof declined. She then offered him a pair of gold spurs, a silk doublet, and a heap of gold, if he would dance with her, and when he refused to do so, she struck him "with an elf-stroke." On the morrow, when all the bridal party was assembled, sir Olof was found dead in a wood.—A Danish Legend (Herder)

Olympia, countess of Holland and wife of Bireno. Being deserted by Bireno, she was bound naked to a rock by pirates, but was delivered by Orlando, who took her to Ireland, where she married king Oberto (bks iv, v).—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Olympia, sister to the great-duke of Muscovia.—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Loyal Subject (1618)

Olympus, of Greece, was on the confines of Macedonia and Thessaly. Here the court of Jupiter was held.

Olympus, in the dominions of Prester John, was "three days' journey from paradise." This Olympus is a corrupt form of Alumbo, the same as Columbo, in Ceylon.

Ophelia, the young, beautiful, and pious daughter of Polonius lord chamberlain to the king of Denmark. Hamlet fell in love with her, but, finding marriage inconsistent with his views of vengeance against "his murderous, adulterous, and usurping uncle," he affected madness, and Ophelia was so wrought upon by his strange behaviour to her, that her intellect gave way In an attempt to gather flowers from a brook, the branch of a tree she was holding snapped, and, falling into the water, she was drowned—Shakespeare, Hamlet (1596)

Oracle of the Holy Bottle (The), an oracle sought for by Rabelais, to solve the knotty point "whether Panurgo (2 syl) should marry or not" The question had been put to sibyl and poet, monk and fool, philosopher and witch, but none could answer it The oracle was ultimately found in Lantern-land

This, of course, is a satire on the celibacy of the clergy and the withholding of the cup from the laity Shall the clergy marry or not?—that was the moot point, and the "Bottle of Tent Wine," or the clergy, who kept the bottle to themselves, alone could solve it Tho omele and priestess of the bottle were both called Bacchē (Hebrew for "bottle") —Rabelais, Pantagruel, iv, v (1545)

Oracle of the Sieve and Shears (The), a method of divination known to the Greeks The modus operandi in the Middle Ages was as follows —The points of a pair of shears were stuck in the rim of a sieve, and two persons supported the shears with their finger-tips A verse of the Bible was then read aloud, and while the names of persons suspected were called over, the sieve was supposed to turn when the right name was suggested (See *KL. Ores'tes (3 syl), son of Agamemnon, betrothed to Hermionê (4 syl) daughter of Menal'os (4 syl) king of Sparta. At the downfall of Troy, Menal'os promised Hermionê in marriage to Pyrrhos king of Epiros, but Pyrrhos fell in love with Androm'achê the widow of Hector, and his captive. An embassy, led by Ores'tes, was sent to Epiros, to demand that the son of Andromachê should be put to death, lest as he grew up he might seek to avenge his father's death. Pyrrhos refused to comply. In this embassy, Ores'tes met Hermionê again, and found her pride and jealousy aroused to fury by the slight offered her. She grieved Ores'tes to avenge her insults, and the ambassadors fell on Pyrrhos and murdered him. Hermionê when she saw the dead body of the king borne along, stabbed herself, and Ores'tes went raving mad.—Ambrose Philips, The Distressed Mother (1712)

Ora'na, daughter of Lisuarte king of England, and spouse of Amadis of Gaul (bk ii 6). The general plot of this series of romance bears on this marriage, and tells of the thousand and one obstacles from rivals, giants, sorcerers, and so on, which had to be overcome before the consummation could be effected. It is in this unity of plot that the Amadis series differs from its predecessors—the Arthurian romances, and those of the paladins of Charlemagne, which are detached adventures, each complete in itself, and not bearing to any common focus.—Amadis de Gaul (fourteenth century)

Orian'a, the ward of old Mirabel, and bound by contract to her guardian's son whom she loves, but young Mirabel shilly-shallies, till he gets into trouble with Lamoree (2 syl), and is in danger of being murdered, when Oriana, dressed as a page, rescues him. He then declares that his "inconstancy has had a lesson," and he marries the lady.—G. Tuquhar, The Inconstant (1702)

Orian'a, in Tennyson's ballad so called, "stood on the castle wall," to see her spouse, a Norland chief, fight. A foeman went between "the chief and the wall," and discharged an arrow, which, glancing aside, pierced the lady's heart and killed her. The ballad is the lamentation of the spouse on the death of his bride (1830)

O'riel, a fairy, whose empire lay along the banks of the Thames, when King Oberon held his court in Kensington Gardens.—Tieckell, Kensington Gardens (1686-1740)

Oriflamme, the banner of St Denis. When the counts of Vexin became possessed of the abbey, the banner passed into their hands, and when, in 1082, Philippe I united Vexin to the crown, the oriflamme or sacred banner belonged to the king. In 1119 it was first used as a national banner. It consists of a crimson silk flag, mounted on a gilt staff (un glaive tout doré ou est attaché une bannière vermeille). The loose end is cut into three wavy vandykes, to represent tongues of flame, and a silk tassel is hung at each cleft. In war, the display of this standard indicates that no quarter will be given. The English standard of no quarter was the "burning dragon."

Raoul de Presle says it was used in the time of Charlemagne, being the gift of the patriarch of Jerusalem. We are told that all infidels were blinded who looked on it. Iroissant says it was displayed at the battle of Rosbecq, in the reign of Charles VI, and "no sooner was it unfurled, than the fog cleared away, and the sun shone on the French alone."

Origilla, the lady-love of Gryphon brother of Aquilant, but the faithless fair one took up with Martiano, a most impudent boaster and a coward. Being at Damascus during a tournament in which Gryphon was the victor, Martiano stole the armour of Gryphon, arrayed himself in it, took the prizes, and then decamped with the lady. Aquilant happened to see them, bound them, and took them back to Damascus, where Martiano was hanged, and the lady kept in bondage for the judgment of Lucina.—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Orillo, a magician and robber, who lived at the mouth of the Nile. He was the son of an imp and fairy. When any one of his limbs was lopped off, he had the power of restoring it, and when his head was cut off, he could take it up and replace it. When Astolpho encountered this magician, he was informed that his life lay in one particular hair, so instead of seeking to maim his adversary, Astolpho cut off the magic hair, and the magician fell lifeless at his feet.—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Orinda "the incomparable," Mrs Katherine Philipps, who lived in the reign of Charles II and died of small-pox.

O'riole (3 syl) The "Baltimore bird" is often so called in America, but the oriole is of the thrush family, and the Baltimore bird is a starling. Its nest is a pendulous cylindrical pouch, some six inches long, usually suspended from two twigs at the extremity of a branch, and therefore liable to swing backwards and forwards by the force of the wind. Hence Longfellow compares a child a swing to an oriole's nest.

Like an oriole's nest,
From which the laughing bird has taken wing;
By thee abandoned hangs thy vacant swing.
Longfellow To a Child

Orion, a giant of great beauty, and a famous hunter, who cleared the island of Chios of wild beasts. While in the island, Orion fell in love with Meropé, daughter of King Cnophon, but one day, in a drunken fit, having offered her violence, the king put out the giant's eyes and drove him from the island. Orion was told if he would travel eastwards, and expose his sockets to the rising sun, he would recover his sight. Guided by the sound of a Cyclops' hammer, he reached Icnos, where Vulcan gave him a guide to the abode of the sun. In due time, his sight returned to him, and at death he was made a constellation. The lion's skin was an emblem of the wild beasts which he slew in Chios, and the club was the instrument he employed for the purpose.

He [Orion]
 Reeled as of yore beside the sea,
 When blinded by Cæopion
 He sought the blacksmith at his forge
 And climbing up the mountain gorge
 Fixed his blank eyes upon the sun
 Longfellow The Occultation of Orion.

Orion and the Blacksmith The reference is to the blacksmith mentioned in the preceding article, whom Orion took on his back to act as guide to the place where the rising sun might be best seen.

Orion's Dogs were Arctophœnus ("the hear-killer") and Ptoophægos ("the glutton of Ptoon," in Bœotia).

Orlando, the younger son of sir Rowland de Boys [Baron]. At the death of his father, he was left under the care of his elder brother Oliver, who was charged to treat him well, but Oliver hated him, wholly neglected his education, and even tried by many indirect means to kill him. At length, Orlando fled to the forest of Arden, where he met Rosalind and Celia in disguise. They had met before at a wrestling match, when Orlando and Rosalind fell in love with each other. The acquaintance was renewed in the forest, and ere many days had passed the two ladies resumed their proper characters, and both were married, Rosalind to Orlando, and Celia to Oliver the elder brother—Shakespeare, As You Like It (1598).

Orlando (in French ROLAND, q v), one of the paladins of Charlemagne, whose nephew he was. Orlando was confiding and loyal, of great stature, and possessed unusual strength. He accompanied his uncle into Spain, but on his return was waylaid in the valley of Roncesallès (in the Pyrenees) by the traitor Ganelon, and perished with all his army, A.D. 778. His adventures are related in Turpin's Chronique, in the Chanson de Roland, attributed to Théroutde. He is the hero of Bojardo's epic, Orlando Innamorato, and of Ariosto's continuation, called Orlando Furioso ("Orlando mad"). Robert Greene, in 1594, produced a drama which he called The History of Orlando Rhode's farce of Bombastès Furioso (1790) is a burlesque of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso.

Orlando's Ivory Horn, Olifant, once the property of Alexander the Great. Its bray could be heard for twenty miles.

Orlando's Horse, Brighndoro ("golden bridle")

Orlando's Sword, Durinda'na or Durandant, which once belonged to Hector, is "preserved at Rocamadour, in France, and his spear is still shown in the cathedral of Pa'via, in Italy."

Orlando was of middling stature, broad shouldered, crooked legged, brown visaged, red bearded, and had much hair on his body. He talked but little, and had a very surly aspect, although he was perfectly good humoured—Cervantes Don Quixote II. l. 1 (1615).

Orlando's Vulnerable Part Orlando was invulnerable except in the sole of his foot, and even there nothing could wound him but the point of a large pin, so that when Bernardo del Carpio assailed him at Roncesallès, he took him in his arms and squeezed him to death, in imitation of Heracles, who squeezed to death the giant Antæus (3 syl.)—Cervantes, Don Quixote, II. ii. 13 (1615).

Orlando Furioso, a continuation of Bojardo's story, with the same hero. Bojardo leaves Orlando in love with Angelica, whom he fetched from Cathay and brought to Paris. Here, says Ariosto, Rinaldo fell in love with her, and, to prevent mischief, the king placed the coquette under the charge of Namus, but she contrived to escape her keeper, and fled to the island of Ebuda, where Rogero found her exposed to a sea-monster, and liberated her. In the mean time, Orlando went in search of his lady, was decoyed into the enchanted castle of Atlantès, but was liberated by Angelica, who again succeeded in effecting her escape to Paris. Here she arrived just after a great battle between the Christians and pagans, and, finding Medora a Moor wounded, took care of him, fell in love with him, and eloped with him to Cathay. When Orlando found himself jilted, he was driven mad with jealousy and rage, or rather his wits were taken from him for three months by way of punishment, and deposited in the moon. Astolpho went to the moon in Eliph's chariot, and St John gave him "the lost wits" in an urn. On reaching France, Astolpho bound the madman, then, holding the urn to his nose, the wits returned to their nidus, and the hero was himself again. After this, the siege was continued, and the Christians were wholly successful (See ORLANDO INNAMORATO) — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

 This romance in verse extends to forty-six cantos. Hoole, in his translation, has compressed the forty-six cantos into twenty-four books, but Rosc has retained the original number. The adventures of Orlando, under the French form "Roland," are related by Turpin in his Chronicle, and by Théroutde in his Chanson de Roland.

 The true hero of Ariosto's romance is Rogero, and not Orlando. It is with Rogero's victory over Rodomont that the poem ends. The concluding lines are

Then at full stretch he [Rogero] raised his arm above
The furious Rodomont, and the weapon drove Thrice in his gaping throat — so ends the strife
And leaves secure Rogero a fame and life

Orlando Innamorato, or Orlando in love, in three books, by count Bojardo of Scandiano, in Italy (1495). Bojardo supposes Charlemagne to be warring against the Saracens in France, under the walls of Paris. He represents the city to be besieged by two infidel hosts—one under Agramant, emperor of Africa, and the other under Girdasso king of Seneca. His hero is Orlando, whom he supposes (though married at the time to Aldabella) to be in love with Angelica, a fascinating coquette from Cathay, whom Orlando had brought to France (See ORLANDO INNAMORATO)

 Berni of Tuscany, in 1538, published a burlesque in verse on the same subject.

Orleans, a most passionate innamorato, in love with Agrippina — Thomas Decker, Old Fortunatus (1600)

Orleans talks pure Biron and Romeo — he is almost as poetical as they quite as philosophical only a little madder — O Lamb

Orlick (Dolge), usually called "Old Orlick," though not above five and twenty, journey man to Joe Gargery, blacksmith. Obstinate, morose, broad-shouldered, loose-limbed, swarthy, of great strength, never in a hurry, and always slouching. Being jealous of Pip, he allured him to a cave in the marshes, bound him to a ladder, and was about to shoot him, when, being alarmed by approaching steps, he fled. Subsequently, he broke into Mr. Pumblechook's house, was arrested, and confined in the county jail. This surly, ill-conditioned brute was in love with Biddy, but Biddy married Joe Gargery — C. Dickens, Great Expectations (1860)

Orloff Diamond (The), the third largest cut diamond in the world, set in the top of the Russian sceptre. The weight of this magnificent diamond is 191 carats, and its size is that of a pigeon's egg. It was once one of the eyes of the idol Sheringham, in the temple of Brühna, came into the hands of the shah Nadir, was stolen by a French grenadier and sold to an English sea-captain for £2000, the captain sold it to a Jew for £12,000, it next passed into the hands of Shafraz, and in 1775, Catherine II. of Russia gave for it £90,000 (See DIAMONDS)

Or'raça (Queen), wife of Affonso II The legend says that five friars of Morocco went to her, and said, "Three things we prophesy to you (1) we five shall all suffer martyrdom, (2) our bodies will be brought to Coimbra, and (3) whichever sees our relics first, you or the king, will die the same day." When their bodies were brought to Coimbra, the king told queen Orraca she must join the procession with him. She pleaded illness, but Affonso replied the relics would cure her, so they started on their journey. As they were going, the queen told the king to speed on before, as she could not travel so fast, so he speeded on with his retinue, and started a boar on the road. "Follow him!" cried the king, and they went after the boar and killed it. In the mean time, the queen reached the procession, fully expecting her husband had joined it long ago, but, lo! she beheld him riding up with great speed. That night the king was aroused at midnight with the intelligence that the queen was dead — Southey, Queen Orraca (1838), Francisco Manoel da Esperança, História Scafica (eighteenth century)

Orsini (Maffio), a young Italian nobleman, whose life was saved by Gennaro, at the battle of Rimini. Orsini became the fast friend of Gennaro, but both were poisoned by the princess Negroni at a banquet.—Donizetti, Lucrezia di Borgia (opera, 1834)

Orsino, duke of Illyria, who sought the love of Olivia a rich countess, but Olivia gave no encouragement to his suit, and the duke moped and pined, leaving mainly sports for music and other effeminate employments. Viola entered the duke's service as a page, and soon became a great favourite. When Olivia married Sebastian (Viola's brother), and the sex of Viola became known, the duke married her and made her duchess of Illyria — Shakespeare, Twelfth Night (1614)

Orson, twin-brother of Valentine, and son of Bellisant. The twin-brothers were born in a wood near Orleans, and Orson was carried off by a bear, which suckled him with its cubs. When he grew up, he became the terror of France, and was called "The Wild Man of the Forest." Ultimately, he was reclaimed by his brother Valentine, overthrew the Green Knight, and married Fezon daughter of the duke of Savary, in Aquitaine — Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century)

Orson and Ellen Young Orson was a comely young farmer from Tinton, stout as an oak, and very fond of the lasses, but he hated matrimony, and used to say, "the man who can buy milk is a fool to keep a cow." While still a lad, Orson made love to Ellen, a rustic maiden, but, in the fickleness of youth, forsook her for a richer lass, and Ellen left the village, wandered far away, and became waiting-maid to old Boniface the innkeeper. One day, Orson happened to stop at this very inn, and Ellen waited on him. Five years had passed since they had seen each other, and at first neither knew the other. When, however, the facts were known, Orson made Ellen his wife, and their marriage feast was given by Boniface himself.—Peter Pindar [Dr Wolcot], Orson and Ellen (1809)

His Sons were Percival, "the sot," Thornecliff, "the bully," John, "the gamekeeper," Richard, "the horse-jockey," Wilfred, "the fool," and Rashleigh, "the scholar," a perfidious villain, killed by Rob Roy — Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Rob Roy Macgregor was dramatized by Pecoek

Osborne (Mr), a hard, money-loving, purse-prond, wealthy London merchant, whose only gospel was that "according to Mammon" He was a widower, and his heart of hearts was to see his son, captain George, marry a rich mulatto. While his neighbour Sedley was prosperous, old Sedley encouraged the love-making of George and Miss Sedley, but when old Sedley failed, and George dared to marry the bankrupt's daughter, to whom he was engaged, the old merchant disinherited him. Captain George fell on the field of Waterloo, but the heart of old Osborne would not relent, and he allowed the widow to starve in abject poverty. He adopted, however, the widow's son, George, and brought him up in absurd luxury and indulgence. A more detestable end than old Sedley cannot be imagined

Maria and Jane Osborne, daughters of the merchant, and of the same mould. Maria married Frederick Bullock, a banker's son

Captain George Osborne, son of the merchant, selfish, vain, extravagant, and self-indulgent. He was engaged to Amelia Sedley while her father was in prosperity, and captain Dobbin induced him to marry her after the father was made a bankrupt. Happily, George fell on the field of Waterloo, or one would never vouch for his conjugal fidelity — Thackeray, Vanity Fair (1848)

Oscar, son of Ossian and grandson of Fingal. He was engaged to Malvina, daughter of Toscar, but before the day of marriage arrived, he was slain in Ulster, fighting against Curbar, who had treacherously invited him to a banquet and then slew him, v p 296. Oscar is represented as most brave, warm-hearted, and impetuous, most submissive to his father, tender to Malvina, and a universal favourite

O Oscar "rill Fingal bend the strong in arm but spare the feeble hand. He then a stream of many tides against the foes of thy people but like the gale that moves the grass to those who ask thine aid. Never search for battle nor shun it when it comes." — Ossian Fingal III

Calbar shrinks before Oscar's sword. He creeps to darkness behind a stone. He lifts the spear in secret he pierces O-car's side. Oscar falls forward on his shield his knee sustains the chief but still the spear is in his hand. See! gloomy Calbar falls. The steel pierces his forehead and divided his red hair behind. He lay like a shattered rock but never more shall Oscar arise — Ossian, Temora I.

Oscar Roused from Sleep. "Caolt took up a huge stone and hurled it on the hero's head. The hill for three miles round shook with the reverberation of the blow, and the stone, rebounding, rolled out of sight. Whereon Oscar awoke, and told Caolt to reserve his blows for his enemies."

Oseway (Dame), the ewe, in the beast-epic of Reynard the Fox (1498)

O'Shanter (Tam), a farmer, who, returning home from Ayr very late and well-soaked with liquor, had to pass the kirk of Alloway. Seeing it was illuminated, he peeped in, and saw there the witches and devils dancing, while old Clootie was blowing the bagpipes. Tam got so excited that he roared out to one of the dancers, "Weel done, Catty Sark! Weel done!" In a moment all was dark. Tam now spurred his "grey mare Meg" to the top of her speed, while all the fiends chased after him. The river Doon was near, and Tam just reached the middle of the bridge when one of the witches, whom he called Cutty Sark, touched him, but it was too late—he had passed the middle of the stream, and was out of the power of the crew. Not so his mare's tail—that had not yet passed the magic line, and Cutty Sark, clinging thereto, dragged it off with an infernal wrench.—R. Burns, Tam O'Shanter

OSIRIS, judge of the dead, brother and husband of Isis. Osiris is identical with Adonis and Thammuz. All three represent the sun, six months above the equator, and six months below it. Adonis passed six months with Aphrodite in heaven, and six months with Persephone in hell. So Osiris in heaven was the beloved of Isis, but in the land of darkness was embraced by Nephtys.

Osiris, the sun, Isis, the moon

*They [the priests] wore rich mitres shaped like the moon,
To show that Isis doth the moon portend
Like as Osiris signifies the sun.*

Spenser Fairy Queen v 7 (1596).

Osman, sultan of the East, the great conqueror of the Christians, a man of most magnanimous mind and of noble generosity. He loved Zara, a young Christian captive, and was by her beloved with equal ardour and sincerity. Zara was the daughter of Lusignan d'Outremer, a Christian king of Jerusalem, she was taken prisoner by Osman's father, with her elder brother Nerestan, then four years old. After twenty years' captivity, Nerestan was sent to France for ransom, and on his return presented himself before the sultan, who fancied he perceived a sort of intimacy between the young man and Zara, which excited his suspicion and jealousy. A letter, begging that Zara would meet him in a "secret passage" of the seraglio, fell into the sultan's hands, and confirmed his suspicions. Zara went to the rendezvous, where Osman met her and stabbed her to the heart. Nerestan was soon brought before him, and told him he had murdered his sister, and all he wanted of her was to tell her of the death of her father, and to bring her his dying benediction. Stung with remorse, Osman liberated all his Christian captives, and then stabbed himself.—Aaron Hill, Zara (1735).

 This tragedy is an English adaptation of Voltaire's Zaire (1738).

Osmand, a necromancer who, by enchantment, raised up an army to resist the Christians. Six of the champions were enchanted by Osmand, but St. George restored them. Osmand tore off his hair in which lay his spirit of enchantment, bit his tongue in two, embowelled himself, cut off his arms, and died.—R. Johnson, Seven Champions of Christendom, 1 19 (1617).

Osmond, an old Varangian guard.—Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Osmyn, alias ALPHONSO, son of Anselmo king of Valencia, and husband of Almeria daughter of Manuel king of Granada. Supposed to have been lost at sea, but in reality cast on the African coast, and tended by queen Zara, who falls in love with him. Both are taken captive by Manuel, and brought to Granada. Hero Manuel falls in love with Zara, but Zara retains her passionate love for Alphonso. Alphonso makes his escape, returns at the head of an army to Granada, finds both the king and Zara dead, but Almeria being still alive becomes his acknowledged bride.—W. Congreve, The Mourning Bride (1697).

 "Osman" was one of John Kemble's characters, Mrs. Siddons taking the role of "Zara."

Osprey. When fish see the osprey, the legend says, they are so fascinated that they "swoon," and, turning on their backs, yield themselves an easy prey to the bird. Rattlesnakes exercise the same fascination over birds.

The osprey the fish no sooner do espy

Osrick, a court fop, contemptible for his affectation and finical dandyism. He is made umpire by king Claudius, when Lærtès and Hamlet "play" with rapiers in "friendly" combat.—Shakespeare, Hamlet (1596).

Osseo's, son of the Evening Star, whose wife was O'weence. In the Northland there were once ten sisters of surpassing beauty, nine married beautiful young husbands, but the youngest, named O'weence, fixed her affections on Osseo, who was "old, poor, and ugly," but "most beautiful within." All being invited to a feast, the nine set upon their youngest sister, taunting her for having married Osseo, but forthwith Osseo leaped into a fallen oak, and was transformed to a most handsome young man, his wife to a very old woman, "wrinkled and ugly," but his love changed not. Soon another change occurred. Oweenee resumed her former beauty, and all the sisters and their husbands were changed to birds, who were kept in cages about Osseo's wigwam. In due time a son was born, and one day he shot an arrow at one of the caged birds, and forthwith the nine, with their husbands, were changed to pygmies.

* * The story of this tragedy is taken from the novelle of Giovanni Giraldi Cinthio (died 1573).

Addison says of Thomas Betterton (1635-1710): "The wonderful agony which he appeared in when he examined the circumstance of the handkerchief in the part of 'Othello,' and the mixture of love that intruded on his mind at the innocent answers of 'Desdemona,' were the perfection of acting." Donaldson, in his Recollections, says that Spranger Barry (1719-1777) was the beau-ideal of an "Othello," and C. Leslie, in his Autobiography, says the same of Edmund Kean (1787-1833).

Otho, the lord at whose board count Lara was recognized by sir Ezzelin. A duel was arranged for the next day, and the contending parties were to meet in lord Otho's hall. When the time of meeting arrived, Lara presented himself, but no sir Ezzelin put in his appearance, whereupon Otho, vouching for the knight's honour, fought with the count, and was wounded. On recovering from his wound, lord Otho became the inveterate enemy of Lara, and accused him openly of having made away with sir Ezzelin. Lara made himself very popular, and headed a rebellion, but lord Otho opposed the rebel, and shot him — Byron, Lara (1814).

Otalissi, eagle of the Indian tribe of Oney'da, the death-enemies of the Hurons. When the Hurons attacked the fort under the command of Waldegrave (2 vol.), a general massacre was made, in which Waldegrave and his wife were slain. But Mrs. Waldegrave, before she died, committed her boy Henry to the charge of Otalissi, and told him to place the child in the hands of Albert of Wyoming, her friend. This Otalissi did. After a lapse of fifteen years, one Brandt, at the head of a mixed army of British and Indians, attacked Oney'da, and a general massacre was made, but Otalissi, wounded, escaped to Wyoming, just in time to give warning of the approach of Brandt. Scarcely was this done, when Brandt arrived. Albert and his daughter Gertrude were both shot, and the whole settlement was exterminated—Campbell, Gertrude of Wyoming (1803)

Overreach (Sir Giles), Wellborn's uncle. An unscrupulous, hard-hearted rascal, grasping and proud. He ruined the estates both of Wellborn and Allworth, and by overreaching grew enormously rich. His ambition was to see his daughter Margaret marry a peer, but the overreacher was overreached. Thinking Wellborn was about to marry the rich dowager Allworth, he not only paid all his debts, but supplied his present wants most liberally, under the delusion "if she prove his, all that is hers is mine." Having thus done, he finds that lady Allworth does not marry Wellborn but lord Lovell. In regard to Margaret, fancying she was sure to marry lord Lovell, he gives his full consent to her marriage, but finds she returns from church not lady Lovell but Mrs. Allworth—Massinger, A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1628).

* * The prototype of "sir Giles Overreach" was sir Giles Mompesson, a usurer outlawed for his misdeeds

When Kemble played sir Giles Overreach he was anxious to represent the part as Henderson (1747-1783) had done it, and wrote to Mrs. Inchbald to know what kind of a hat Mr Henderson wore what kind of wig cravat ruffles clothes, stockings with or without clocks square or round toed shoes I shall be uneasy if I have not an idea of his dress even to the shape of his buckles and what rings he wore on his hands. A voracious and cruelly seen the groundwork of this monstrous figure, but I am at a loss to know whether in copying it I should draw the lines that express his courtesy to lord Lovel [sic] with an exaggerated strength or not. "Mrs. Inchbald's answer is unfortunately lost.—W C Russell Representative Actors

Overie (John), a ferryman, who used to ferry passengers from Southwark to the City, and accumulated a considerable hoard of money by his savings. On one occasion, to save the expense of board, he simulated death, expecting his servants would fast till he was buried, but they broke into his larder and cellar, and held riot. When the old miser could bear it no longer, he started up, and belaboured his servants right and left, but one of them struck the old man with an oar, and killed him.

Mary Overie, the beautiful daughter of the ferryman. Her lover, hastening to town, was thrown from his horse, and died. She then became a nun, and founded the church of St Mary Overie on the site of her father's house.

Overton (Colonel), one of Cromwell's officers.—Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth).

Ovid (The French), Du Bellay, also called "The Father of Grace and Elegance" (1524-1560).

Ovid and Corinna. Ovid disguises, under the name of Corinna, the daughter of Augustus, named Julia, noted for her beauty, talent, and licentiousness. Some say that Corinna was Livia the wife of Augustus.—Amor, i 5.

So was her heavenly body comely raised
On two faire columnes those that Ovid praised
In Julia's borrowed name

Ovo. Ab ovo usque ad mala ("from the egg to the apple"), from the beginning to the end of a feast or meal. The Romans began their entertainments with eggs, and ended with fruits.—Horace, Sat, i 3, 6, Cicero, Fam, ix 20.

Ow'ain (Sir), the Irish knight of King Stephen's court, who passed through St Patrick's purgatory by way of penance, —Henry of Saltrey, The Descent of Owain (1153).

O'weenee, the youngest of ten sisters, all of surpassing beauty. She married Osseo, who was "old, poor, and ugly," but "most beautiful within" (See Ossro).—Longfellow, Hiawatha, xii (1855).

Owen (Sam), groom of Darsie Latimer, i.e. sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet.—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III).

Owen, confidential clerk of Mr Osbaldistone, senior.—Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I).

Owen (Sir) passed in dream through St Patrick's purgatory. He passed the convent gate, and the warden placed him in a coffin. When the priests had sung over him the service of the dead, they placed the coffin in a cave, and sir Owen made his descent. He came first to an ice desert, and received three warnings to retreat, but the warnings were not heeded, and a mountain of ice fell on him. "Lord, Thou canst save!" he cried as the ice fell, and the solid mountain became like dust, and did sir Owen no harm. He next came to a lake of fire, and a demon pushed him in. "Lord, Thou canst save!" he cried, and angels carried him to paradise. He woke with ecstasy, and found himself lying before the cavern's mouth.—R Southey, St Patrick's Purgatory (from the Fabliaux of Mon le Grand).

Owen Meredith, Robert Bulwer Lytton, afterwards lord Lytton, son of the poet and novelist (1831-).

Owl (The), sacred to Minerva, was the emblem of Athens.

Owls hoot in B^b and G^b or in F[#] and A^b—Fev G White Natural History of Selborne xiv (1789).

Owl a Baker's Daughter (The). Our Lord once went into a baker's shop to ask for bread. The mistress instantly put a cake in the oven for Him, but the daughter, thinking it to be too large, reduced it to half the size. The dough, however, swelled to an enormous bulk, and the daughter cried out, "Heugh! heugh! heugh!" and was transformed into an owl.

Well God Ield you! They say the owl was a baker's daughter.—Shakespeare Hamlet (1606).

Ox (The Dumb), St Thomas Aquinas, so named by his fellow-students on account of his taciturnity (1224-1274).

An ox once spoke as learned men deliver.—Beaumont and Fletcher Rule a Wife and Have a Wife III. 1 (1610).

Ox. The black ox hath trod on his foot, he has married and is hen-pecked, calamity has befallen him. The black ox was sacrificed to the infernals, and was consequently held accursed. When Tusser says the best way to thrive is to get married, the objector says

Why then do folk this proverb put,
The black ox near trod on thy foot,
If that way were to thrive?

Il feing and Thrieling, lxxi. (1557)

The black ox had not trod on his or her foot
But ere his branch of blessing could reach any root
The flowers so faded that in fifteen weeks
A man might copy the change in the cheeks
Both of the poor wretch and his wife.

Dryden Polyolbion, xl (1613)

Oyster Pistol says, "The world's mine oyster, which I with sword will open." He alludes to the proverb, "The mayor of Northampton opens oysters with his dagger," for, Northampton being some eighty miles from the sea, oysters were so stale before they reached the town (before railroads or even coaches were known), that the "mayor" would be loth to bring them near his nose.

Oysters Those most esteemed by the Romans were the oysters of Cyzicum, in Bithynia, and of Lucrinum, in Apulia, upon the Adriatic Sea. The best in Britain used to be the oysters of Walfleet, near Colchester.

Think you our oysters here unworthy of your praise?
Pure Walfleet as excellent as those

The Cyzic shells, or those on the Lucrinian coast.

Dryden Polyolbion xlx. (1622)

 The oysters most esteemed by Englishmen are the Whitstable, which fetch a fabulous price. Colchester oysters (na'ives) in 1878 were sold at 4s. a dozen.

Ozair (2 syl.), a prophet. One day, riding on an ass by the ruins of Jerusalem, after its destruction by the Chaldeans, he doubted in his mind whether God could raise the city up again. Whereupon God caused him to die, and he remained dead a hundred years, but was then restored to life. He found the basket of figs and cruse of wine as fresh as when he died, but his ass was a mass of bones. While he still looked, the dry bones came together, received life, and the resuscitated ass began to bray. The prophet no longer doubted the power of God to raise up Jerusalem from its ruins—Al Korân, ii (Sale's notes).

 This legend is based on Neh ii 12-20.

P

P Placentinus the dominican wrote a poem of 253 Latin hexameters, called Pugna Porcorum, every word of which begins with the letter p (died 1548). It begins thus

Placidite Porcelli porcorum pugna propago Progredditur etc.

There was one composed in honour of Charles le Chanve, every word of which began with c.

The best-known alliterative poem in English is the following—

Pacific (The), Amadeus VIII count of Savoy (1383, 1391-1439, abdicated and died 1451)

Frederick III emperor of Germany (1415, 1440-1493)

Olaus III of Norway (*, 1030-1093)

Pac'olet, a dwarf, "full of great sense and subtle ingenuity." He had an enchanted horse, made of wood, with which he carried off Valentine, Orson, and Clermond from the dungeon of Terragus. This horse is often alluded to "To ride Pacolet's horse" is a phrase for going very fast—Valentine and Orson (fifteenth century)

Pacolet, a familiar spirit—Steele, The Tatler (1709)

Pacolet or NICK STRUMPFER, the dwarf servant of Norna "of the Fitful Head"—Sir W Scott, The Pirate (time, William III)

Pacomo (St), an Egyptian, who lived in the fourth century. It is said that he could walk among serpents unhurt, and when he had occasion to cross the Nile, he was carried on the back of a crocodile.

The hermit fell on his knees before an image of St. Pacomo which was glued to the wall.—Lesage Gilt Blas iv 9 (17-4)

Pactolus (now called Bagouly), a river of Lydia, in Asia Minor, which was said to flow over golden sand.

Pad'alon, the Hindu hell, under the earth. It has eight gates, each of which is guarded by a gigantic deity. Described by Southey, in cantos xxi, xxiii of The Curse of Kehama (1809)

Paddington (Harry), one of Mac-heath's gang of thieves. Peachum describes him as a "poor, petty-larceny fiseal, without the least genius. That fellow," he says, "though he were to live for six months, would never come to the gallows with credit" (act i. 1)—Gay, The Beggar's Opera (1727).

Paddington Fair, a public execution. Tyburn is in the parish of Paddington. Public executions were abolished in 1868.

Paddy, an Irishman. A corruption of Padhrig, Irish for Patrick.

Padlock (The), a comic opera by Bickerstaff. Don Diego (2 syl), a wealthy lord of 60, saw a country maiden named Leonora, to whom he took a fancy, and arranged with the parents to take her home with him and place her under the charge of a duenna for three months, to see if her temper was as sweet as her face was pretty, and then either "to return her to them spotless, or make her his lawful wife." At the expiration of the time, the don went to arrange with the parents for the wedding, and locked up his house, giving the keys to Ursula the duenna. To make surance doubly sure, he put a padlock on the outer door, and took the key with him. Leander, a young student smitten with the damsel, laughed at locksmiths and duennas, and, having gained admission into the house, was detected by don Diego, who returned unexpectedly. The old don, being a man of sense, at once perceived that Leander was a more suitable bridegroom than himself, so he not only sanctioned the alliance, but gave Leonora a handsome wedding dowry (1768).

Pæan, the physician of the immortals.

Pæ'na, daughter of Corinthus, "fair as ever yet saw living eye," but "too loose of life and eke too light." Pæana fell in love with Amias, a captive in her father's dungeon, but Amias had no heart to give away. When Placidus was brought captive before Pæana, she mistook him for Amias, and married him. The poet adds, that she thenceforth so reformed her ways "that all men much admired the change, and spake her praise."—Spenser, Fairy Queen, iv 9 (1596).

Pagan, a fay who loved the princess Imis, but Imis rejected his suit, as she loved her cousin Philax. Pagan, out of revenge, shut them up in a superb crystal palace, which contained every delight except that of leaving it. In the course of a few years, Imis and Philax longed as much for a separation as, at one time, they wished to be united.—Comtess de Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Palace of Revenge," 1682).

Windsor When sir John Falstaff made love to Mrs Page, Page himself assumed the name of Brook, to outwit the knight. Sir John told the supposed Brook his whole "course of wooing," and how nicely he was bamboozling the husband. On one occasion, he says, "I was carried out in a buck-basket or dirty linen before the very eyes of Page, and the deluded husband did not know it." Of course, sir John is thoroughly outwitted and played upon, being made the butt of the whole village.

Mrs Page, wife of Mr Page, of Windsor. When sir John Falstaff made love to her, she joined with Mrs Ford to dupe him and punish him.

Anne Page, daughter of the above, in love with Fenton. Slender calls her "the sweet Anne Page."

Page (Sir Francis), called "The Hanging Judge" (1661-1741).

Slender and poison dread from Della's race.

Hard words or hanging if your justice be I say.

1000.

Paget (The lady), one of the ladies of the bedchamber in queen Elizabeth's court — Sir W. Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth).

Painted Chamber (The), an apartment in the old Royal Palace of Westminster, the walls of which were painted chiefly with battle-scenes, in six bands, somewhat similar to the Bayeux tapestry.

Painted Mischief, playing cards.

There are plenty of ways of gambling without recourse to the "painted mischief" which was not introduced for the benefit of king Charles VI of France. — Daily News March 2, 1879.

Painter of Nature Remi Belleau, one of the Pleiad poets, is so called (1526-1577).

The Shepherdes Calendar, by Spenser, is largely borrowed from Belleau's Song of April.

Painter of the Graces, Andrea Appiani (1754-1817).

Painters

A Bee Quintin Metsys, the Dutch painter, painted a bee so well that the artist Mandyn thought it a real bee, and proceeded to brush it away with his handkerchief (1150-1529).

A Cow Myro carved a cow so true to nature that bulls mistook it for a living animal (B.C. 431).

A Curtain Parrhasios painted a curtain so admirably that even Zeuxis, the artist, mistook it for real drapery (B.C. 400).

A Fly George Alexander Stevens says, in his Lectures on Heads.

I have heard of a connoisseur who was one day in an auction room where there was an admirable piece of painting of fruits and flowers. The connoisseur would not give his opinion of the picture till he had first examined the catalogue, and finding it was done by an Englishman he pulled out his eye-glass. Oh sir, says he, those English fellows have no more idea of genius than a Dutch skipper has of dancing a cotillon. The doer has spoiled a fine piece of canvas, he is worse than a Harp Alley sign post dauber. There's no keeping no perspective, no foreground. Why there now the fellow has actually attempted to paint a fly upon that ro-sund. Why it is no more like a fly than I am like — but, as he approached his finger to the picture the fly flew away (17).

Grapes Zeuxis (2 syl), a Grecian painter, painted some grapes so well that birds came and pecked at them, thinking them real grapes (B.C. 400).

A Horse Apelles painted Alexander's horse Bucephalos so true to life that some mares came up to the canvas neighing, under the supposition that it was a real animal (about B.C. 331).

A Man Velasquez painted a Spanish admiral so true to life that when king Felipe IV entered the studio, he mistook the painting for the man, and began reproving the supposed officer for neglecting his duty, in wasting his time in the studio, when he ought to have been with his fleet (1590-1660).

Accidental effects in painting

Apelles, being at a loss to paint the foam of Alexander's horse, dashed his brush at the picture in a fit of annoyance, and did by accident what his skill had failed to do (about B.C. 331).

The same tale is told of Protogenes, who dashed his brush at a picture, and thus produced "the foam of a dog's mouth," which he had long been trying in vain to represent (about B.C. 332).

Painters (Princes of) Parrhasios and Apelles are both so called (fourth century B.C.).

Painters' Characteristics

ANGLO (Michael) in iron frame, strongly developed muscles, and an anatomical display of the human figure. The Aschylos of painters (1171-1561).

CARRACCI eclectic artists, who pecked out and pieced together parts taken from Correggio, Raphael, Titian, and other great artists. If Michael Angelo is the Aschylos of artists, and Raphael the Sophocles, the Carracci may be called the Euripides of painters. I know not why in England the name is spelt with only one ;

CORREGGIO known by his wonderful foreshortenings, his magnificent light and shade. He is, however, very monotonous (1494-1534)

CROME (John) an old woman in a red cloak walking up an avenue of trees (1769-1821)

DAVID noted for his stiff, dry, pedantic, "highly classic" style, according to the interpretation of the phrase by the French in the first Revolution (1748-1825)

DOREL (Carlo) famous for his Madonnas, which are all finished with most extraordinary delicacy (1616-1686)

DOMENICHINO famed for his frescoes, correct in design, and fresh in colouring (1581-1641)

GUIDO his speciality is a pallid or bluish-complexioned saint, with saucer or uplifted eyes (1574-1642)

HOBBA characterized by bold relief, exquisite finish, force of conception, delicacy of tone, and dark background (1498-1554)

LORRAINE (Claude) a Greek temple on a hill, with sunny and highly finished classic scenery. Aerial perspective (1600-1682)

MURILLO a brown-faced Madonna (1618-1682)

OMEGACK sheep (1775-1826)

PETRINO (Pietro) known by his narrow, contracted figures and scrumpy drapery (1446-1524)

POUSSIN famous for his classic style Reynolds says "No works of any modern have so much the air of antique painting as those of Poussin" (1593-1665)

POUSSIN (Gaspar) a landscape painter, the very opposite of Claude Lorraine. He seems to have drawn his inspiration from Hervey's Meditations Among the Tombs, Blair's Grave, Young's Night Thoughts, and Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (1613-1675)

RAPHAEL the Sophocles of painters Angelo's figures are all gigantesque and ideal, like those of Aeschylus. Raphael's are perfect human beings (1483-1520)

REYNOLDS a portrait-painter. He presents his portraits in bel masque, not always suggestive either of the rank or character of the person represented. There is about the same analogy between Watteau and Reynolds, as between Claude Lorraine and Gaspar Poussin (1723-1792)

ROSA (Salvator) dark, inscrutable

pictures, relieved by dabs of palette-knife. He is fond of savage scenery, broken rocks, wild caverns, blasted heaths, and so on (1615-1673)

RUBENS patches of vermilion dabbed about the human figure, wholly out of harmony with the rest of the colouring (1577-1640)

STRECH (Jan) an old woman peeling vegetables, with another old woman looking at her (1636-1679)

TICCIOTTI full of wild fantastical inventions. He is called "The Lightning of the Pencil" (1512-1591)

TITIAN noted for his broad shades of divers gradations (1477-1576)

VIRONISI (Paul) noted for his great want of historical correctness and elegance of design, but he abounds in spirited banquets, sumptuous edifices, brilliant aerial spectres, magnificent robes, gaud, and jewellery (1530-1588)

WATTEAU noted for his fetes galantes, fancy-ball costumes, and generally gaudy figures (1684-1721)

The colouring of Titian, the expression of Rubens, the grace of Raphael, the purity of Domenichino, the correctness of Correggio, the learning of Poussin, the airs of Guido, the taste of the Carracci, the grand contour of Angelo, the brilliant truth of a Watteau, the touching grace of a Reynolds.—Sterne

Paix des Dames (La), the treaty of peace concluded at Cambray in 1529, between François I of France and Karl V emperor of Germany. So called because it was mainly negotiated by Louise of Savoy (mother of the French king) and Margaret the emperor's aunt

Paladore, a Briton in the service of the king of Lombardy. One day, in a boar-hunt, the boar turned on the princess Sophia, and, having gored her horse to death, was about to attack the lady, but was slain by the young Briton. Between these two young people a strong attachment sprang up, but the duke Bireno, by an artifice of false impersonation, induced Paladore to believe that the princess was a wanton, and had the audacity to accuse her as such to the senate. In Lombardy, the punishment for this offence was death, and the princess was ordered to execution. Paladore, having learned the truth, accused the duke of villainy. They fought, and Bireno fell. The princess, being cleared of the charge, married Paladore.—Robert Jephson, The Law of Lombardy (1779)

Palamedes (4 syl.), son of Nauplios, was, according to Suidas, the inventor of dice (See ALEA)

Tabula nomen ludi, hanc Palamedes ab Graecis exercitus

delectationem magna eruditione & pte ingenio farent. Tabula enim est mundus terrestris, duodenarius numerus est Zodiaci. Ipse vero arcus et septentrio in ea grana sunt & ptem stellas planetarum. Turris est altitudo oculi ex qua omnibus bonis et malis rependuntur.—Suidas (Wolfe trans.).

Palamedes (Sir), a Sirrren who adored Isolde the wife of King Mark of Cornwall. Sir Tristrem also loved the same lady, who was his aunt. The two "lovers" fought, and sir Palamedes, being overcome, was compelled to turn Christian. He was baptized, and sir Tristrem stood his sponsor at the font.—Thomas of Breeldoune, called "The Rhymers," Sir Tristrem (thirteenth century).

Palamedes of Lombardy, one of the allies of the Christian army in the first crusade. He was shot by Corindus with an arrow (bk xi).—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

Palamon and Arcite (2 syl), two young Theban knights, who fell into the hands of duke Theseus (2 syl), and were by him confined in a dungeon at Athens. Here they saw the duke's sister-in-law, Emily, with whom both fell in love. When released from captivity, the two knights told to the duke their tale of love, and the duke promised that whichever proved the victor in single combat, should have Emily for his prize. Arcite prayed to Mars "for victory," and Palamon to Venus that he might "obtain the lady," and both their prayers were granted. Arcite won the victory, according to his prayer, but, being thrown from his horse, died, so Palamon, after all, "won the lady," though he did not win the battle.—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales ("The Knight's Tale," 1388).

This tale is taken from the Le Tescide of Boecaccio.

The Black Horse, a drama by John Hatcher, is the same tale. Richard Edwards has a comedy called Palamon and Arcyte (1566).

Pale (The) or THE ENGLISH PALE, a part of Ireland, including Dublin, Meath, Carlow, Kilkenny, and Louth.

Pale Faces. So the American Indians call the European settlers.

Pale'mon, son of a rich merchant. He fell in love with Anna, daughter of Albert master of one of his father's ships. The purse-proud merchant, indignant at this, tried every means to induce his son to abandon such a "mean connection," but without avail, so at last he sent him in the Britannia (Albert's ship) "in charge of the merchandise." The ship was wrecked near cape Colonna, in Attica, and although Palmon escaped, his ribs were so broken that he died almost as soon as he reached the shore.

A gallant youth Palmon was his name Charged with the commerce hither also came
A father's stern resentment doomed to prove
He came the victim of unhappy love.

Falcone The Shipwreck l. 2 (136)

Pale'mon and Lavinia, a poetic version of Boy and Ruth. "The lovely young Lavinia" went to glean in the fields of young Palemon "the pride of swains," and Palemon, falling in love with the beautiful gleaner, both wooed and won her.—Thomson, The Seasons ("Autumn," 1730).

Pales (2 syl), god of shepherds and their flock.—Roman Mythology.

Pomona loves the orchard
And Liber loves the vine
And Pales loves the straw built bed
Warm with the breath of kine.

Lord Macaulay Lays of Ancient Rome (Prologue of Cato, 1841)

Palinode (3 syl), a shepherd in Spenser's Eclogues. In eccl v Palinode represents the catholic priest. He invites Piers (who represents the protestant clergy) to join in the fun and pleasures of May. Piers then warns the young man of the vanities of the world, and tells him of the great degeneracy of pastoral life, at one time simple and frugal, but now discontented and licentious. He concludes with the fable of the kid and her dam. The fable is thus: A mother-goat, going abroad for the day, told her kid to keep at home, and not to open the door to strangers. She had not been gone long, when up came a fox, with head bound from "headache," and foot bound from "gout," and carrying a ped of trinkets. The fox told the kid a most piteous tale, and showed her a little mirror. The kid, out of pity and vanity, opened the door, but while stooping over the ped to pick up a little bell, the fox clapped down the kid, and carried her off.

In eccl vii Palinode is referred to by the shepherd Thomas as "lording it over God's heritage," feeding the sheep with chaff, and keeping for himself the grains.—Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar (1572).

Pal'nodi (3 syl), a poem in recantation of a calumny. Stesichorus wrote a bitter satire against Helen, for which her brothers, Castor and Pollux, plucked out his eyes. When, however, the poet recanted, his sight was restored to him again

The bird who libelled Helen in his song
Recanted after and redressed the wrong
Ovid Art of Love III

Horace's Ode, xvi 1 is a palinode Samuel Butler has a palinode, in which he recanted what he said in a previous poem of the Hon Edward Howard Dr Watts recanted in a poem the praise he had previously bestowed on queen Anne

Palinu'rus, the pilot of Æne'as Palinurus, sleeping at the helm, fell into the sea, and was drowned The name is employed as a generic word for a steersman or pilot, and sometimes for a chief minister Thus, prince Bismarck may be called the palinurus of William emperor of Germany and king of Prussia

More had she spoke but yawned All nature nods
Even Palinurus nodded at the helm
Pope The Dunciad iv 614 (1742)

Palisse (La), a sort of M Prnd-homme, a pompous utterer of truisms and moral platitudes

Palla'dio (Andrea), the Italian classical architect (1518-1580)

The English Palladio, Inigo Jones (1573-1653)

Pal'ladium

Of Ceylon, the deláda or tooth of Buddha, preserved in the Malegwa temple at Kandy Natives guard it with great jealousy, from a belief that whoever possesses it, acquires the right to govern Ceylon When, in 1815, the English obtained possession of the tooth, the Ceylonese submitted to them without resistance

Of Eden Hall, a drinking-glass, in the possession of sir Christopher Musgrave, bart, of Edenhall, Cumberland

Of Jerusalem, Aladine king of Jerusalem stole an image of the Virgin, and set it up in a mosque, that she might no longer protect the Christians, but become the palladium of Jerusalem The image was rescued by Sophronia, and the city taken by the crusaders

Of Meg'ara, a golden hair of king Nisus Scylla promised to deliver the city into the hands of Minos, and cut off the talismanic lock of her father's head while he was asleep

Of Rome, the ancile or sacred buckler which Numa said fell from heaven, and was guarded by priests called Salii

Of Scotland, the great stone of Seone, near Perth, which was removed by Edward I to Westminster, and is still there, preserved in the coronation chair

Of Troy, a colossal wooden statue of Pallas Minerva, which "fell from heaven" It was carried off by the Greeks, by whom the city was taken and burned to the ground

Pallo, a painter, in Smollett's novel of Peregrine Pickle (1751)

The absurdities of Pallet are printed an inch thick, and by no human possibility could such an accumulation of comic disasters have befallen the characters of the tale

Palm Sunday (Sad), March 29, 1461, the day of the battle of Towton, the most fatal of any domestic war ever fought It is said that 37,000 Englishmen fell on this day

Whose banks received the blood of many thou and men
On sad Palm Sunday slain that Towton field we call

The bloodiest field betwixt the White Rose and the Red Drayton Polyolbon xxviii (1622)

Pal'merin of England, the hero and title of a romance in chivalry There is also an inferior one entitled Palmerin de Oliva

The next two books were Palmerin de Oliva and Palmerin of England The former said the cure shall be torn in pieces and burnt to the last ember but Palmerin of England shall be preserved as a relique of antiquity and placed in such a chest as Alexander found amongst the spoils of Darius, and in which he kept the writings of Homer This same book is valuable for two things first, for its own especial excellency and next, because it is the production of a Portuguese monarch famous for his literary talents The adventures of the castle of Miragorda therein are finely imagined the style of composition is natural and elegant and the utmost decorum is preserved throughout.—Cervantes Don Quixote I 16 (1602)

Palmy'ra, daughter of Alcānor chief of Mecca She and her brother Zaphna were taken captives in infancy, and brought up by Mahomet As they grew in years, they fell in love with each other, not knowing their relationship, but when Mahomet laid siege to Mecca, Zaphna was appointed to assassinate Alcānor, and was himself afterwards killed by poison Mahomet then proposed marriage to Palmyra, but to prevent such an alliance, she killed herself—James Miller, Mahomet the Impostor (1740)

Palmyra of the Deccan, Bijapur, in the Poonah district

Palmyra of the North, St Petersburg

Pal'myrene (The), Zenobia queen of Palmyra, who claimed the title of "Queen of the East" She was defeated by Aurelian, and taken prisoner (A D 273) Longinus lived at her court, and was put to death on the capture of Zenobia

The Palmyrene that fought Aurelian
Tennyson The Princess II (187)

Pal'mides (Sir), son and heir of sir Astlabor His brothers were sir Safire and sir Segwarid's He is always called the Saracen, meaning "unchristened" Next to the three great knights (sir Lancelot, sir Tristram, and sir Lamorne), he was the strongest and bravest of the fellowship of the Round Table. Like sir Tristram, he was in love with La Belle Isoud wife of King Mark of Cornwall, but the lady favoured the love of sir Tristram, and only despised that of the Saracen knight After his combat with sir Tristram, sir Palomides consented to be baptized by the bishop of Carlisle (pt III 25)

He was well made, cleanly and lively and neither too young nor too old. And though he was not christened, yet he believed in the her manners and was faithful and true of his promise and also well contented. He made a wish that he would never be christened unto the time that he achieved the Great Chastelant. And also he showed power to take full chivalry and in the time that he had done seven battles within the time.—S R T Malory History of Prince Arthur II 142 (14 0)

Pam, Henry John Temple, viscount Palmerston (1784-1865) Knave of clubs

Pam'ela, Lady Edward Fitzgerald is so called (*-1831)

Pam'ela [Am'el'as], a simple, unsophistical country girl, the daughter of two aged parents, and maid-servant of a rich young squire, called B, who tries to seduce her. She resists every temptation, and at length marries the young squire and reforms him. Pamela is very pure and modest, bears her afflictions with much meekness, and is a model of maidenly prudence and rectitude. The story is told in a series of letters which Pamela sends to her parents.—S Richardson, Pamela or in the Power (1710)

The pure and modest character of the English maiden (Am'el) is so well maintained in her sorrows and afflictions as to be true with so much meekness. Her little letter to her father breaks in on her troubles so much like the specks of the sky through a cloudy atmosphere, that the whole scene is nothing tranquillizing and doubtless edifying.—W Scott

Pamela is a work of much humer or pretence than Caroline Baroque. A simple country girl, whom her master attempts to seduce and afterwards marries. The wardrobe of Pamela, a gown of velvet and stuff and her round-laced caps, her various attempts to escape and the conveyance of her letters, the listful character of Mrs. Jewkes and the flight of the boys of her master before the better part of his nature obtains ascendancy—the entire is touched with the hand of a master.—Chambers English Literature II 161

Pope calls the word "Pamela"

The gaily dressed Pamela with her raptures
Gave the gilt coach and dappled Flantern mares.
The shining robes rich jewels, beds of state,
And the softest of silks.

Pride, pomp, and state but reach her outward part,— Ere sighs and is no slouch at her heart.
Epistles (To Mrs Mount, with the work of Voltaire" 1709)

Pami'na and Tami'no, the two lovers who were guided by "the magic flute" through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of divine truth (or the mysteries of Isis)—Mozart, Die Zauberflöte (1790)

Pamphlot (Mr), a penny-a-liner His great wish was "to be taken up for sedition" He writes on both sides, for, as he says, he has "two hands, ambo dexter"

Time has been "he says, 'when I could turn a penny by an earthquake or live upon a full dinner or dine upon a bloody murder, but now that's all over—nothing will do now but reading a minister or telling the people they are ruined. The people of England are never so happy as when you tell them they are ruined.'—Murphy, The Letterer II 1 (1704)

Pan, Nature personified, especially the vital crescent power of nature

Universal Pan
Kiss with the Graces and the Hours in dance
Led on to eternal spring
Milton Paradise Lost IV 206, etc. (1633)

Pan, in Spenser's eel is Henry VIII, and "Syrinx" is Anne Boleyn. In eel. 1 "Pan" stands for Jesus Christ in one passage, and for God the Father in another.—Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar (1572)

Panacea Prince Ahmed's apple or apple of Samarcand (see p 45) The balsam of Hierabrus (see p 75) The Promethium unguent rendered the body invulnerable. Aladdin's ring was a preservative against all ills that flesh is heir to (see p 16) Then there were the Youth Restorers. And the healers of wounds, such as Achille's spear, also called "The Spear of Telephus" (see p 4), Gilbert's sword (see p 382), and so on Pancaste (d syl) or Cami aspr, one of the concubines of Alexander the Great. Apell'as fell in love with her while he was employed in painting the king of Macedon, and Alexander, out of regard to the artist, gave her to him for a wife. Apell'as selected for his "Venus Rising from the Sea" (usually called "Venus Anadyomene") this beautiful Athenian woman, together with Phryne another courtesan

* * * Phryne was also the scendy figure for the "Cnidian Venus" of Praxiteles

Pancks, a quiel, short, eager, dark man, with too much "way" Hedressed in black and rusty iron grey, had jet-black beads for eyes, a scrubby little black chin, wiry black hair striking out from his head in prongs like hair-pins, and a complexion that was very dingy by nature, or very dirty by art, or a compound of both. He had dirty hands, and dirty, broken nails, and looked as if he had been in the coals. He snorted and sniffed, and puffed and blew, and was generally in a perspiration. It was Mr Pancks who "moled out" the secret that Mr Dorrit, imprisoned for debt in the Marshalsea prison, was heir-at-law to a great estate, which had long lain unclaimed, and was extremely rich (ch xxxv). Mr Pancks also induced Clennam to invest in Merdle's bank shares, and demonstrated by figures the profit he would realize, but the bank being a bubble, the shares were worthless — C. Dickens, Little Dorrit (1857).

Panocrace, a doctor of the Aristotelian school. He maintained that it was improper to speak of the "form of a hat," because form "est la disposition exterieure des corps qui sont animés," and therefore we should say the "figure of a hat," because figure "est la disposition exterieure des corps qui sont inanimés," and because his adversary could not agree, he called him "un ignorant, un ignorantissime, ignorantifiant, et ignorantissime" (se viii) — Molière, Le Mariage Forcé (1664).

Pancras (The carl of), one of the skilful companions of Barlow the famous archer, another was called the "Marquis of Ishington," while Barlow himself was mirthfully created by Henry VIII "Duke of Shoreditch."

Pancras (St), patron saint of children, martyred by Diocletian at the age of 14 (A.D. 304).

Pan'darus, the Lycian, one of the allies of Priam in the Trojan war. He is drawn under two widely different characters. In classic story he is depicted as an admirable archer, slain by Diomed, and honoured as a hero-god in his own country, but in mediæval romance he is represented as a despicable pimp, inasmuch that the word pander is derived from his name. Chaucer in his Troilus and Cressida, and Shakespeare in his drama of Troilus and Cressida, represent him as procuring for Troilus the good graces of Cressida, and in Much Ado about Nothing, it is said that Troilus "was the first employer of pandars."

Let all pitiful goers-between be called to the world's end after my name call them all Pandars." Let all constant men be Troilus, and all false women Cressida." — Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida act iii. sc. 2 (1602).

Pandemo'nium, "the high capital of Satan and his peers." Here the infernal parliament was held, and to this council Satan convened the fallen angels to consult with him upon the best method of encompassing the "fall of man." Satan ultimately undertook to visit the new world, and, in the disguise of a serpent, he tempted Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit — Milton, Paradise Lost, ii (1665).

Pandi'on, king of Athens, father of Procné and Philomela.

Pandolf (Sir Harry), the teller of whole strings of stories, which he repeats at every gathering. He has also a stock of bon-mots. "Madam," said he, "I have lost by you to-day." "How so, sir Harry?" replies the lady. "Why, madam," rejoins the baronet, "I have lost an excellent appetite." "This is the thirty-third time that sir Harry hath been thus arch."

We are constantly after supper entertained with the Glastonbury Thorn. When we have wondered at that a little Father with the son let us have the Spirit in the Wood. After that Now tell us how you served the robber. Alack! with sir Iffury with a smile. I ha to in.

Pandolfe (2 syl), father of Lelie — Molière, L'Etourdi (1653).

Pando'ra, the "all-gifted woman." So called because all the gods bestowed some gift on her to enhance her charms. Jove sent her to Prometheus for a wife, but Hermès gave her in marriage to his brother Epimetheus (4 syl). It is said that Pandora enticed the curiosity of Epimetheus to open a box in her possession, from which flew out all the ills that flesh is heir to. Luckily the lid was closed in time to prevent the escape of Hope.

More lovely than Pandora, whom the gods
Endowed with all their gifts to the unwise son
Of Japhet brought by Hermès, she insured
Mankind with her fair looks to be avenged
On him [Prometheus] who had stole Jove's fire.
Milton Paradise Lost iv 714, etc. (1655).

Panandrum (The Grand), any village potentate or Brummagem magnate The word occurs in S Foote's farrago of nonsense, which he wrote to test the memory of old Macklin, who said in a lecture "he had brought his own memory to such perfection that he could learn anything by rote on once hearing it"

He was the Great Panandrum of the place—Percy Fitzgerald

* * The squire of a village is the Grand Panandrum, and the small gentry the Picinnies, Jobillies, and Garryulies

Foote's nonsense lines are these

So she went into the garden to cut a cabbage leaf to make up apple pie and at the same time a great she-bear coming up the street, pops its head into the shop
What's no soap! So he died and she very imprudently married the barber and there were present the

Pantag'ruel's Course of Study Pantagruel's father, Gargantua, said in a letter to his son

I intend and insist that you learn all languages perfectly first of all Greek In Quintilian's method then Latin then Hebrew then Arabic and Chaldee I wish you to form your style of Greek on the model of Plato and of Latin on that of Cicero Let there be no history you have not at your fingers' ends and study thoroughly cosmography and geography Of liberal arts such as geometry mathematics and music I gave you a taste when not above five years old and I would have you now master them fully Study astronomy but not divination and judicial astrology which I consider mere vanities As for civil law I would have thee know the digesta by heart You should also have a perfect knowledge of the works of Nature so that there is no sen river or smallest stream, which you do not know for what fish it is noted, whence it proceeds and whither it directs its course all fowls of the air all shrubs and trees whether forest or orchard all herbs and flowers all metals and stones, should be mastered by you Fall not at the same time most carefully to peruse the Tal mudists and Cabalists and be sure by frequent munitoes to gain a perfect knowledge of that other world called the interoccosm which is man Master all these in your young days and let nothing be superficial as you grow into manhood you must learn chivalry warfare, and field manoeuvres.—Rabelais, Pantagruel II, 8 (1533)

Pantag'ruel's Tongue It formed shelter for a whole army His throat and mouth contained whole cities

Then did they [the army] put themselves in close order and stood as near to each other as they could and Pantagruel put out his tongue half way and covered them all as a hen doth her chickens—Rabelais Pantagruel II 82 (1533)

Pantagruelian Lawsuit (The) This was between lord Busqueue and lord Suekist, who pleaded their own cases The writs, etc, were as much as four asses could carry After the plaintiff had stated his case, and the defundant had made his reply, Pantagruel gave judgment, and the two suitors were both satisfied, for no one understood a word of the pleadings, or the tenor of the verdict—Rabelais, Pantagruel, II (1533)

Pantagruelion, a herb (hemp), symbolical of persecution Rabelais says Pantagruel was the inventor of a certain use for which this herb served. It was, he says, exceedingly hateful to felons, who detested it as much as strangle-weed

Paradisa'ica ("the fruit of paradise") So the banana is called The Mohammedans aver that the "forbidden fruit" was the banana or Indian fig, and cite in confirmation of this opinion that our first parents used fig leaves for their covering after their fall

Paradise, in thirty-three cantos, by Dante (1311) Paradise is separated from Purgatory by the river Lethê, and Dante was conducted through nine of the spheres by Beatrice, who left him in the sphere of "unbodied light," under the charge of St Bernard (canto xxxi) The entire region is divided into ten spheres, each of which is appropriated to its proper order The first seven spheres are the seven planets, viz (1) the Moon for angels, (2) Mercury for archangels, (3) Venus for virtues, (4) the Sun for powers, (5) Mars for principalities, (6) Jupiter for dominions, (7) Saturn for thrones The eighth sphere is that of the fixed stars for the cherubim, the ninth is the primum mobile for the seraphim, and the tenth is the empyrean for the Virgin Mary and the trine deity Beatrice, with Rachel, Sarah, Judith, Rebecca, and Ruth, St Augustin, St Francis, St Benedict, and others, were enthroned in Venus the sphere of the virtues The empyrean, he says, is a sphere of "unbodied light," "bright effluence of bright essence, uncreante" This is what the Jews called "the heaven of the heavens"

Paradise was placed, in the legendary maps of the Middle Ages, in Ceylon, but Mahomet placed it "in the seventh heaven" The Arabs have a tradition that when our first parents were cast out of the garden, Adam fell in the isle of Ceylon, and Eve in Joddah (the port of Mecca)—Al Korân, ii

Paradise and the Peri A peri was told she would be admitted into heaven if she would bring thither the gift most acceptable to the Almighty. She first brought a drop of a young patriot's blood, shed on his country's behalf, but the gates would not open for such an offering. She next took thither the last sigh of a damsel who had died nursing her betrothed, who had been stricken by the plague, but the gates would not open for such an offering. She then carried up the repentant tear of an old man converted by the prayers of a little child. All heaven rejoiced, the gates were flung open, and the peri was received with a joyous welcome.—T. Moore, Lalla Rookh ("Second Tale," 1617)

Paradise Lost Satan and his crew, still suffering from their violent expulsion out of heaven, are roused by Satan's telling them about a "new creation," and he calls a general council to deliberate upon their future operations (bk i). The council meet in the Pandemonium hall, and it is resolved that Satan shall go on a voyage of discovery to this "new world" (bk ii). The Almighty sees Satan, and confers with His Son about man. He foretells the Fall, and arranges the scheme of man's redemption. Meantime, Satan enters the orb of the sun, and there learns the route to the "new world" (bk iii). On entering Paradise, he overhears Adam and Eve talking of the one prohibition (bk iv). Raphael is now sent down to warn Adam of his danger, and he tells him who Satan is (bk v), describes the war in heaven, and expulsion of the rebel angels (bk vi). The angel visitant goes on to tell Adam why and how this world was made (bk vii), and Adam tells Raphael of his own experience (bk viii). After the departure of Raphael, Satan enters into a serpent, and, seeing Eve alone, speaks to her. Eve is astonished to hear the serpent talk, but is informed that it had tasted of "the tree of knowledge," and had become instantly endowed with both speech and wisdom. Curiosity induces Eve to taste the same fruit, and she persuades Adam to taste it also (bk ix). Satan now returns to hell, to tell of his success (bk x). Michael is sent to expel Adam and Eve from the garden (bk xi), and the poem concludes with the expulsion, and Eve's lamentation (bk xii).—Milton (1667)

Paradise Lost was first published by Matthias Walker of St Dunstan's. He gave for it £5 down, on the sale of 1300 copies, he gave another £5. On the next two impressions, he gave other like sums. For the four editions, he therefore paid £20. The agreement between Walker and Milton is preserved in the British Museum.

It must be remembered that the wages of an ordinary workman was at the time about 3d a day, and we now give 8s, so that the price given was equal to about £270, according to the present value of money. Goldsmith tells us that the clergyman of his "deserted village" was "passing rich" with £10 a year = £500 present value of money.

Paradise Regained, in four books. The subject is the Temptation of Christ, being tempted, lost paradise, Christ, being tempted, regained it.

Book I Satan presents himself as an old peasant, and, entering into conversation with Jesus, advises Him to satisfy His hunger by miraculously converting stones into bread. Jesus gives the tempter to know that He recognizes him, and refuses to follow his suggestion.

II Satan reports progress to his ministers, and asks advice. He returns to the wilderness, and offers Jesus wealth, as the means of acquiring power, but the suggestion is again rejected.

III Satan shows Jesus several of the kingdoms of Asia, and points out to Him their military power. He advises Him to seek alliance with the Parthians, and promises his aid. He says by such alliance He might shake off the Roman yoke, and raise the kingdom of David to a first-class power. Jesus rejects the counsel, and tells the tempter that the Jews were for the present under a cloud for their sins, but that the time would come when God would put forth His hand on their behalf.

IV Satan shows Jesus Rome, with all its greatness, and says, "I can easily dethrone Tiberius, and seat Thee on the imperial throne." He then shows Him Athens, and says, "I will make Thee master of their wisdom and high state of civilization, if Thou wilt fall down and worship me." "Get thee behind Me, Satan!" was the indignant answer, and Satan, finding all his endeavors useless, tells Jesus of the sufferings prepared for Him, takes Him back to the wilderness, and leaves Him there, but angels come and minister unto Him.—Milton (1671)

Paraguay (A Tale of) by Southey, in four cantos (1814). The small-pox, having broken out amongst the Guaranis, carried off the whole tribe except Quirí and his wife Monnáma, who then migrated from the fatal spot to the Mondai woods. Here a son (Yerúti) and afterwards a daughter (Mooma) were born, but before the birth of the latter, the father was eaten by a jaguar. When the children were of a youthful age, a Jesuit priest induced the three to come and live at St. Jóachim (3 syl), so they left the wild woods for a city life. Here, in a few months, the mother flagg'd and died. The daughter next drooped, and soon followed her mother to the grave. The son, now the only remaining one of the entire race, begged to be baptized, received the rite, cried, "Ye are come for me! I am ready," and died also.

Parallel "None but itself can be its parallel," from The Double Falsehood, iii. 1. Theobald (1721). Massinger, in The Duke of Milan, iv. 3 (1662), makes Sforza say of Marelia Parc aux Cerfs ("the deer park"), a mansion in Versailles, to which girls were inveigled for the licentious pleasure of Louis XV. An Alsatia.

Toulouge may be proud of being the parc aux cerfs to those whom remorseless greed drives from their island home.—Saturday Review

Par'cinus, a young prince in love with his cousin Irolita, but beloved by Azira. The fairy Dynamo was Azira's mother, and resolved to make Irolita marry the fairy Brutus, but Parcinus, aided by the fairy Favourable, surmounted all obstacles, married Irolita, and made Brutus marry Azira.

Parcinus had a noble air, a delicate shape, a fine head of hair admirably white. He did everything well, danced and sang to perfection, and gained all the prizes at tournaments, whenever he contended for them.—Comtesse D'Aunoy Fairy Tales ("Perfect Love" 1632)

Par'dalo, the demon-steed given to Iniguez Guerra by his goblin mother, that he might ride to Toledo and liberate his father, don Diego Lopez lord of Biscay, who had fallen into the hands of the Moors.—Spanish Story

Par'diggle (Mrs.), a formidable lady, who conveyed to one the idea "of wanting a great deal of room." Like Mrs. Jellyby, she devoted herself to the concerns of Africa, and made her family of small boys contribute all their pocket money to the cause of the Borrioboola Gha mission.—C. Dickens, Black House (1853)

Pardoner's Tale (The), in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, is "Death and the Rioters." Three rioters agree to hunt down Death, and kill him. An old man directs them to a tree in a lane, where, as he said, he had just left him. On reaching the spot, they find a rich treasure, and cast lots to decide who is to go and buy food. The lot falls on the youngest, and the other two, during his absence, agree to kill him on his return. The rascal sent to buy food poisons the wine, in order to secure to himself the whole treasure. Now comes the catastrophe. The two set on the third and slay him, but die soon after of the poisoned wine, so the three rioters find death under the tree, as the old man said, paltering in a double sense (1388).

Parian Chronicle, a register of the chief events in the history of ancient Greece for 1318 years, beginning with the reign of Cecrops and ending with the archonship of Diognētus. It is one of the Arundelian Marbles, and was found in the island of Paros.

Parian Verse, ill-natured satire, so called from Archelochus, a native of Paros.

Pari-Ba'nou, a fairy who gave prince Ahmed a tent, which would fold into so small a compass that a lady might carry it about as a toy, but, when spread, it would cover a whole army.—Arabian Nights ("Prince Ahmed and Pari-Banou")

Paridel is a name employed in the Dunciad for an idle libertine—rich, young, and at leisure. The model is sir Paridel, in the Faery Queen

Thou too my Paridel, she marked thee there,
Stretched on the rack of a too-easy chair
And heard thy everlasting yawn confess
The pains and penalties of idleness.

I hope The Dunciad iv 341 (174.)

Paridel (Sir), descendant of Paris, whose son was Parisus who settled in Paros, and left his kingdom to his son Paridas, from whom Paridel descended. Having gained the hospitality of Malbecco, sir Paridel eloped with his wife Dame Hel'more (3 syl'), but soon quitted her, leaving her to go whither she would. "So had he served many another one" (bk iii 10). In bk iv I sir Paridel is discomfited by sir Seudamior—Spendar, Faery Queen, in 10, iv 1 (1596).

* * "Sir Paridel" is meant for Charles Nevil, sixth and last of the Nevils earls of Westmoreland. He joined the Northumberland rebellion of 1569 for the restoration of Mary queen of Scots, and when the plot failed, made his escape to the Continent, where he lived in poverty and obscurity. The earl was quite a Lothario, whose delight was to win the love of women, and then to abandon them.

Paris, a son of Priam and Hecuba, noted for his beauty. He married Helen, daughter of Cebren the river-god. Subsequently, during a visit to Menelaos king of Sparta, he eloped with queen Helen, and this brought about the Trojan war. Being wounded by an arrow from the bow of Philoctetes, he sent for his wife, who hastened to him with remedies, but it was too late—he died of his wound, and Helen hanged herself—Homer, Iliad.

Paris was appointed to decide which of the three goddesses (Juno, Pallas, or Minerva) was the fairest fair, and to which should be awarded the golden apple thrown "to the most beautiful." The three goddesses tried by bribes to obtain the verdict. Juno promised him dominion if he would decide in her favour, Minerva promised him wisdom, but Venus said she would find him the most beautiful of women for wife, if he allotted to her the apple. Paris handed the apple to Venus.

successful suitor of his cousin Juliet—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1598)

Paris. The French say, Il n'y a que Paris ("there is but one city in the world worth seeing, and that is Paris"). The Neapolitans have a similar phrase, Voi Naples et mourir.

Paris of Japan, Oshika, south-west of Miako—Gibson, Gallery of Geography, 926 (1872).

Little Paris. Brussels is so called. So is the "Galleria Vittorio Emanuele" of Milan, on account of its brilliant shops, its numerous cafés, and its general gaiety.

Paris (Notre Dame de), by Victor Hugo (1831). (See ESMERALDA and QUASIMODO.)

Paris Garden, a bear-garden on the south bank of the Thames, so called from Robert de Paris, whose house and garden were there in the time of Richard II.

Do you take the court for Paris Garden?—Shakespeare Henry VIII act v sc. 4 (1601)

Parisina, wife of Azo chief of Ferrara. She had been betrothed before her marriage to Hugo, a natural son of Azo, and after Azo took her for his bride, the attachment of Parisina and Hugo continued, and had freer scope for indulgence. One night, Azo heard Parisina in sleep confess her love for Hugo, whereupon he had his son beheaded, and, though he spared the life of Parisina, no one ever knew what became of her—Byron, Parisina (1816).

Such is Byron's version, but history says Niccolo III of Ferrara (Byron's "Azo") had for his second wife Parisina Malatesta, who showed great aversion to Ugo, a natural son of Niccolo, whom he greatly loved. One day, with the hope of lessening this strong aversion, he sent Ugo to escort her on a journey, and the two fell in love with each other. After their return, the affection of Parisina and Ugo continued unabated, and a servant named Zoe'se (3 syl') having told the marquis of their criminal intimacy, he had the two guilty ones brought to open trial. They were both condemned to death, Ugo was beheaded first, then Parisina. Some time after, Niccolo married a third wife, and had several children—Frazzi, History of Ferrara.

Parismenos, the hero of the second part of Parismus (qv). This part contains the adventurous travels of Parismenos, his deeds of chivalry, and love for the princess Angelica, "the Lady of the Golden Tower"—Emanuel Foord, Parismenos (1598)

Paris'mus, a valiant and renowned prince of Bohemia, the hero of a romance so called. This "history" contains an account of his battles against the Persians, his love for Laurana, daughter of the king of Thessaly, and his strange adventures in the Desolate Island. The second part contains the exploits and love affairs of Parismenos—Emanuel Foord, Parismus (1598)

Parizade (4 syl), daughter of Khrosrou-shah sultan of Persia, and sister of Bahman and Perviz. These three, in infancy, were sent adrift, each at the time of birth, through the jealousy of their two maternal aunts, who went to nurse the sultana in her confinement, but they were drawn out of the canal by the superintendent of the sultan's gardens, who brought them up. Parizade rivalled her brothers in horsemanship, archery, running, and literature. One day, a devotee who had been kindly entreated by Parizade, told her the house she lived in wanted three things to make it perfect: (1) the talking bird, (2) the singing tree, and (3) the gold-coloured water. Her two brothers went to obtain these treasures, but failed. Parizade then went, and succeeded. The sultan paid them a visit, and the talking bird revealed to him the story of their birth and bringing up. When the sultan heard the infamous tale, he commanded the two sisters to be put to death, and Parizade, with her two brothers, were then proclaimed the lawful children of the sultan—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last story.)

* * The story of Chery and Fairstar, by the comtesse D'Aunoy, is an imitation of this tale, and introduces the "green bird," the "singing apple," and the "dancing water."

Parley "If yo parley with the foe, you're lost"—Arden of Feversham, iii. 2 (1592), recast by Geo. Lillo (1739)

Parley (Peter), Samuel Griswold Goodrich, an American. Above seven millions of his books were in circulation in 1859 (1793-1860)

* * Several piracies of this popular name have appeared. Thus, S. Kettell of America pirated the name in order to sell under false colours, Darton and Co. issued a Peter Parley's Annual (1841-1855), Sumkins, a Peter Parley's Life of Paul (1845), Bogue, a Peter Parley's Visit to London, etc. (1844), Tegg, several works under the same name, Hodson, a Peter Parley's Bible Geography (1839), Clements, a Peter Parley's Child's First Step (1839). None of which works were by Goodrich, the real "Peter Parley."

William Martin was the writer of Darton's "Peter Parley series." George Mogridge wrote several tales under the name of Peter Parley. How far such "false pretences" are justifiable, public opinion must decide.

Parnelle (Mde), the mother of Mon Orgon, and an ultra-admirer of Tartuffe, whom she looks on as a saint. In the adaptation of Molière's comedy by Isaac Bickerstaff, Mde Parnelle is called "old lady Lambert," her son, "sir John Lambert," and Tartuffe, "Dr Cantwell"—Molière, Tartuffe (1664), Bickerstaff, The Hypocrite (1768)

* * The Nonjuror, by Cibber (1706), was the quarry of Bickerstaff's play.

Parody (Father of), Hippodamachos of Ephesus (sixth century B.C.)

Parolles (3 syl), a boastful, cowardly follower of Bertram count of Roussillon. His utterances are raucous enough, but our contempt for the man smothered our mirth, and we cannot laugh. In one scene the bully is taken blindfold among his old acquaintances, who he is led to suppose are his enemies, and he vilifies their characters to their faces in most admired foolery—Shakespeare, All's Well that Ends Well (1598)

He (Dr Parr) was a mere Parolles in a pedagogue's wig—Volc & Ambrosiane

(For similar tongue-doughty heroes, see BASSISCO, BLESS, BUIR, BONVIL, BOROUGHCIEFF, BRAZIN, FIASH, PISTOI, PARCO PORTICIS, SCARINOUGH, THIRISO, VINCENT DE LA ROSA, etc.)

Parpaillons (King of the), the father of Garguicelle "a jolly pug and well-mouthed wench" who married Grangousier "in the vigour of his age," and became the mother of Gargantua—Labeisais, Gargantua, i 3 (1533)

Parr (Old) Thomas Parr, we are told, lived in the reign of ten sovereigns. He married his second wife when he was 120 years old, and had a child by her. He was a husbandman, born at Salop, in 1183, and died 1635, aged 152.

Parricide (The Beautiful), Beatrice Cenci, who is said to have murdered her father for the incestuous brutality with which he had treated her (died 1599).

Shelley has a tragedy on the subject, called The Cenci (1819).

Parsley Peel, the first sir Robert Peel. So called from the great quantity of printed calico with the parsley-leaf pattern manufactured by him (1750-1830).

Parson Adams, a simple-minded country clergyman of the eighteenth century. At the age of 50 he was provided with a handsome income of £23 a year (nearly £300 of our money)—Fielding, Joseph Andrews (1742).

Timothy Burrell, Esq., in 1715, bequeathed to his nephew Timothy, the sum of £20 a year, to be paid during his residence at the university, and to be continued to him till he obtained some preferment worth at least £30 a year—Sussex Archaeological Collections, iii 172.

Goldsmith says the clergyman of his "deserted village" was "passing" or exceedingly rich, for he had £40 a year (equal to £500 now). In Norway and Sweden, to the present day, the clergy are paid from £20 to £40 a year, and in France, £10 is the usual stipend of the working clergy.

Parson Bate, a stalwart, choleric, sporting parson, editor of the Morning

Post in the latter half of the eighteenth century. He was afterwards sir Henry Bate Dudley, bart.

When sir Henry Bate Dudley was appointed an Irish dean a young lady of Dublin said: Och! how I long to see our dean! They say he fights like an angel!—Cause's Magazine (London Legends iii).

Parson Runo (A), a simple-minded clergyman, wholly unacquainted with the world, a Dr Primrose, in fact. It is a Russian household phrase, having its origin in the singular simplicity of the Lutheran clergy of the Isle of Runo.

Parson Trulliber, a fat clergyman, slothful, ignorant, and intensely bigoted—Fielding, Joseph Andrews (1742).

Parsons (Walter), the giant porter of king James I (died 1622)—Tuller, Worthies (1662).

Parsons' Kaiser (The), Karl IV of Germany, who was set up by pope Clement VI, while Ludwig IV was still on the throne. The Germans called the pope's protégé, "pfaffen kaiser."

Parthenia, the mistress of Argalus—Sir Philip Sidney, Arcadia (1580).

Parthenia, Maidenly Chastity personified. Parthenia is sister of Agneta (3 syl) or wisely chastity, the spouse of Incontinent's or temperance. Her attendant is Frithre or modesty (Greek, parthenia, "maidenhood")—Phineas Fletcher, The Purple Island, x (1633).

Parthenope (4 syl), one of the three syrens. She was buried at Naples. Naples itself was anciently called Parthenopé, which name was changed to Nepolis ("the new city") by a colony of Cambrans.

 that occasion. In the winter of 1834 there set in a great flood upon that town the tide rose to an incredible height the waves rolled in upon the houses and everything was threatened with destruction. In the midst of this sublime storm Daniel Partington, who lived upon the beach, was seen at the door of her house with mop and pailers, trundling her mop squeaking out the sea water and vigorously pushing away the Atlantic Ocean. The Atlantic was roared Mrs.
 Partington's spirit was up but I need not tell you that the contest was unequal. The Atlantic beat Mrs Partington. She was excellent at a mop or pail but should never have meddled with a tempest. — Sydney Smith (speech at Taux on 1831)

Sister Partlet with her hooded head, the cloistered community of nuns, the Roman Catholic clergy being the "barndoor fowls" — Drayden, Hind and Panther (1687)

Partridge Talus was changed into a partridge

Partridge, cobbler, quack, astrologer, and almanac-maker (died 1708) Dean Swift wrote an elegy on him

Here five feet deep lies on his back
 A cobbler, starmonker and quack
 Who to the stars in yore good will Does to his bet look up and still
 To keep all you see owners that use
 His fill his almanacs or shoes.

Partridge, the attendant of Tom Jones, as Strap is of Smollett's "Roderick Random" Faithful, shrewd, and of child-like simplicity. He is half barber and half schoolmaster. His excitement in the play-house when he went to see Garrick in "Hamlet" is charming — Fielding, The History of Tom Jones (1749)

The humour of Smollett, although genuine and hearty is coarse and vulgar. He was superficial where Fielding showed deep insight but he had a rude conception of generosity of which Fielding seems incapable. It is owing to this that "Strap" is superior to "Partlet," — Hazlitt Comic Writers

Partridge's Day (Saint), September 1, the first day of partridge shooting. So August 12 is called "St Grouse's Day"

Parvenue One of the O'Neals, being told that Barrett of Castlemone had only been 400 years in Ireland, replied,

"I hate the upstart, which can only look back to yesterday"

Parviz ("victorious"), surname of Khosrou II of Persia. He kept 15,000 female musicians, 6000 household officers, 20,500 saddle-mules, 960 elephants, 200 slaves to scatter perfumes when he went abroad, and 1000 scabbers to water the roads before him. His horse, Shabdiz, was called "the Persian Bucephalus"

The reigns of Khosrou I and II were the golden period of Persian history

Parzival, the hero of a metrical romance, by Wolfram von Eschenbach. Parzival was brought up by a widowed mother in solitude, but when grown to manhood, two wandering knights persuaded him to go to the court of King Arthur. His mother, hoping to deter him, consented to his going if he would wear the dress of a common jester. This he did, but soon achieved such noble deeds that Arthur made him a knight of the Round Table. Sir Parzival went in quest of the holy grail, which was kept in a magnificent castle called Grailburg, in Spain, built by the royal priest Titurel. He reached the castle, but having neglected certain conditions, was shut out, and, on his return to court, the priestess of Grailburg insisted on his being expelled the court and degraded from knighthood. Parzival then led a new life of abstinence and self-abnegation, and a wise hermit became his instructor. At length he reached such a state of purity and sanctity that the priestess of Grailburg declared him worthy to become lord of the castle (twelfth century)

* * This, of course, is an allegory of a Christian giving up everything in order to be admitted a priest and king in the city of God, and becoming a fool in order to learn true wisdom (see 1 Cor iii 18)

Pasquin, a Roman cobbler of the latter half of the fifteenth century, whose shop stood in the neighbourhood of the Braschi palace near the Piazza Navona. He was noted for his caustic remarks and bitter sayings. After his death, a mutilated statue near the shop was called by his name, and made the repository of all the bitter epigrams and satirical verses of the city, hence called pasquinades (3 syl)

Passe-tyme of Plesure, an allegorical poem in forty-six capitulos and in seven-line stanzas, by Stephen Hawes (1515) The poet supposes that while Graunde Amoure was walking in a meadow, he encountered Fame, "enuyroned with tongues of fyre," who told him about La bell Pucell, a ladye fair, living in the Tower of Musike, and then departed, leaving him under the charge of Gouvernaunce and Grace who conducted him to the Tower of Doctrine Countenance, the portress, showed him over the tower, and lady Science sent him to Grumer Afterwards he was sent to Logyke, Rethorike, Invention, Arismetrike, and Musike In the Tower of Musike he met La bell Pucell, pleaded his love, and was kindly entreated, but they were obliged to part for the time being, while Graunde Amoure continued his "passe-tyme of plesure" On quitting La hell Pucell, he went to Geometrye, and then to Dame Astronomy Then, leaving the Tower of Science, he entered that of Chyualry Here Mynerne introduced him to kyng Melyzyus, after which he went to the temple of Venus, who sent a letter on his behalf to La hell Pucell Meanwhile, the giant False Report (or Godfrey Gobilyue), met him, and put him to great distress in the house of Correction, but Perceuraunce at length conducted him to the manour-house of Dame Comfort After sundry trials, Graunde Amoure married La bell Pucell, and, after many a long day of happiness and love, was arrested by Age, who took him before Polye and Avarice Death, in time, came for him, and Remembrance wrote his epitaph

Paston Letters, letters chiefly written to or by the Paston family, in Norfolk Charles Knight calls them "an invaluable record of the social customs of the fifteenth century" Two volumes appeared in 1787, entitled Original Letters Written During the Reigns of Henry VI, Edward IV, and Richard III, by Various Persons of Rank Three extra volumes were subsequently printed

Some doubt has been raised respecting the authenticity of these letters

Pastor Fl'ido (II), a pastoral by Giovanni Battista Guarini of Ferrara (1585)

Pastoral Romance (The Father of), Honore d'Urfé (1567-1625)

Pastorella, the fair shepherdess (bk. 11 9), beloved by Corydon, but "neither for him nor any other did she care a whit" She was a foundling, brought up by the shepherd Melibee When sir Calidore (3 syl) was the shepherd's guest, he fell in love with the fair foundling, who returned his love During the absence of sir Calidore in a hunting expedition, Pastorella, with Melibee and Corydon, were carried off by brigands Melibee was killed, Corydon effected his escape, and Pastorella was wounded Sir Calidore went to rescue his shepherdess, killed the brigand chief, and brought back the captive in safety (bk. 11 11) He took her to Belgard Castle, and it turned out that the beautiful foundling was the daughter of lady Clarybel and sir Bellamour (bk. 11 12) — Spenser, Fairy Queen, 11 9-12 (1596)

"Pastorella" is meant for Frances Walsingham, daughter of sir Francis Walsingham, whom sir Philip Sidney ("sir Calidore") married After Sidney's death, the widow married the earl of Essex (the queen's favourite) Sir Philip being the author of a romance called Arcadia, suggested to the poet the name Pastorella

Patago'nians This word means "large foot," from the Spanish patagón ("a large, clumsy foot") The Spaniards so called the natives of this part of South America, from the unusual size of the human foot-prints in the sand It appears that these foot-prints were due to a large clumsy shoe worn by the natives, and were not the impressions of naked feet

Patriarch of Dorchester, John White of Dorchester, a puritan divine (1574-1618)

Patriarchs (The Last of the) So Christopher Casby of Bleeding-heart

Yard was called "So grey, so slow, so quiet, so impassionate, so very bumpy in the head, that patriarch was the word for him." Painters implored him to be a model for some patriarch they designed to paint. Philanthropists looked on him as famous capital for a platform. He had once been town agent in the Circumlocution Office, and was well-to-do.

His face had a bloom on it like ripe wall fruit, and his blue eyes seemed to be the eyes of wisdom and virtue. His whole face beamed with the look of benediction. Nobody could say where the wisdom was or where the virtue was, or where the benediction was, but they seemed to be somewhere about him. He wore a long wide skirted bottle-green coat and a bottle-green pair of trousers, and a bottle-green waistcoat. The patriarch was not dressed in bottle-green broadcloth and yet his clothes looked patriarchal.—G. Dickens Little Dorrit (1857)

Patrick, an old domestic at Shaw's Castle—Sir W. Scott, St. Ronan's Well (time, George III.)

Patric (St.), the tutelary saint of Ireland. Born at Kirk Patrick, near Dumbarton. His baptismal name was "Succeth" ("valour in war"), changed by Milcho, to whom he was sold as a slave, into "Cotharig" (four families or four masters, to whom he had been sold). It was pope Celestine who changed the name to "Patricus," when he sent him to convert the Irish.

Certainly the most marvellous of all the miracles ascribed to the saints is that recorded of St. Patrick. "He swam across the Shannon with his head in his mouth!"

St. Patrick and King O'Neil. One day, the saint set the end of his crozier on the foot of O'Neil king of Ulster, and, leaning heavily on it, hurt the king's foot severely, but the royal convert showed no indication of pain or annoyance whatsoever.

A similar anecdote is told of St. Ared, who went to show the king of Abyssinia a musical instrument he had invented. His majesty rested the head of his spear on the saint's foot, and leaned with both his hands on the spear while he listened to the music. St. Ared, though his great toe was severely pierced, showed no sign of pain, but went on playing as if nothing was the matter.

St. Patrick and the Serpent. St. Patrick cleared Ireland of vermin. One old serpent resisted, but St. Patrick overcame it by cunning. He made a box, and invited the serpent to enter in. The serpent insisted it was too small, and so high the contention grew that the serpent got into the box to prove that he was right, whereupon St. Patrick slammed down the lid, and cast the box into the sea.

This tradition is marvellously like an incident of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. A fisherman had drawn up a box or vase in his net, and on breaking it open a genius issued therefrom, and threatened the fisherman with immediate destruction because he had been enclosed so long. Said the fisherman to the genius, "I wish to know whether you really were in that vase?" "I certainly was," answered the genius. "I cannot believe it," replied the fisherman, "for the vase could not contain even one of your feet." Then the genius, to prove his assertion, changed into smoke, and entered into the vase, saying, "Now, incredulous fisherman, dost thou believe me?" But the fisherman elopped the leaden cover on the vase, and told the genius he was about to throw the box into the sea, and that he would build a house on the spot to warn others not to fish up so wicked a genius.—Arabian Nights ("The Fisherman," one of the early tales).

* * St. Patrick, I fear, had read the Arabian Nights, and stole a leaf from the fisherman's book.

St. Patrick a Gentleman

Oh St. Patrick was a gentleman
Who came of decent people.

This song was written by Messrs Bennet and Toleken, of Cork, and was first sung by them at a masquerade in 1811. It was afterwards lengthened for Webbe, the comedian, who made it popular.

St. Patrick's Purgatory, lough Derg, in Ireland. At the end of the fifteenth century, the purgatory of lough Derg was destroyed, by order of the pope, on St. Patrick's Day, 1497.

Calderon has a drama entitled The Purgatory of St. Patrick (1600–1681).

Patriot King (The), Henry St. John viscount Bolingbroke (1678–1751). He hired Mallet to traduce Pope after his decease, because the poet refused to give up certain copies of a work which the statesman wished to have destroyed.

Write as if St. John's soul could still inspire
And do from hate what Mallet did for hire
Byron English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1800)

Patriot of Humanity. So Byron calls Henry Grattan (1750–1820)—Don Juan (preface to canto vi, etc., 1824).

Patron (The), a farce by S. Foote (1761). The patron is Sir Thomas Loft, called by his friends, "sharp-judging Adrie', the Muse's friend, himself a Muse," but by those who loved him less, "the modern Midas." Books without number were dedicated to him, and the writers addressed him as the "British Pollio, Atticus, the Mæcenas of England, protector of arts, paragon of poets, arbiter of taste, and sworn appraiser of Apollo and the Muses." The plot is very simple. Sir Thomas Loftly has written a play called Robinson Crusoe, and gets Richard Bever to stand godfather to it. The play is damned past redemption, and, to soothe Bever, sir Thomas allows him to marry his niece Juliet.

Horace Walpole, earl of Orford, is the original of "sir Thomas Loftly" (1717-1797).

Patten, according to Gay, is so called from Patti, the pretty daughter of a Lincolnshire farmer, with whom the village blacksmith fell in love. To save her from wet feet when she went to milk the cows, he mounted her elogs on an iron cke.

The patten now supports each fragile dame
Which from the blue-eyed Patti takes its name.
Gay Tricia I (1712)

(Of course, the word is the French patin, "a skate or high-heeled shoe," from the Greek, patein, "to walk.")

Pattieson (Mrs Peter), in the introduction of The Heart of Midlothian, by sir W. Scott, and again in the introduction of The Bride of Lammermoor. He is a hypothetical assistant teacher at Gander-eleuch, and the feigned author of The Tales of My Landlord, which sir Walter Scott pretends were published by Jedediah Cleishbotham, after the death of Pattieson.

Patty, "the maid of the mill," daughter of Fairfield the miller. She was brought up by the mother of lord Aimworth, and was promised by her father in marriage to Farmer Giles, but she refused to marry him, and became the bride of lord Aimworth. Patty was very clever, very pretty, very ingenuous, and loved his lordship to adoration.—Bickerstaff The Maid of the Mill (1765).

Pattypan (Mrs), a widow who keeps lodgings, and makes love to Tim Tartlet, to whom she is ultimately engaged.

By all accounts, she is just as loving now as she was thirty years ago.—James Cobb The First Floor I 2 (1766 1818).

lady Ashton.—Sir W. Scott, Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III.)

Pau-Puk-Keewis, a cunning mischief-maker, who taught the North American Indians the game of hazard, and stripped them by his winnings of all their possessions. In a mad freak, Pau-Puk-Keewis entered the wigwam of Hiawatha, and threw everything into confusion, so Hiawatha resolved to slay him. Pau-Puk-Keewis, taking to flight, prayed the beavers to make him a beaver ten times their own size. This they did, but when the other beavers made their escape at the arrival of Hiawatha, Pau-Puk-Keewis was hindered from getting away by his great size, and Hiawatha slew him. His spirit, escaping, flew upwards, and prayed the storm-fools to make him a "brant" ten times their own size. This was done, and he was told never to look downwards, or he would lose his life. When Hiawatha arrived, the "brant" could not forbear looking at him, and immediately he fell to earth, and Hiawatha transformed him into an eagle.

Now in winter when the snowflakes
Whirl in eddies round the lodges.

There they cry comes Pau Puk Keewis,
He is dancing thro' the village,
He is gathering in his harvest.

Longfellow Hiawatha xiv. (1855)

Paul, the love-child of Margaret, who retired to port Louis, in the Mauritius, to bury herself, and bring up her only child. Hither came Mde de la Tour, a widow, and was confined of a daughter, whom she named Virginia. Between these neighbours a mutual friendship arose, and the two children became play-mates. As they grew in years, their fondness for each other developed into love. When Virginia was 15, her mother's aunt adopted her, and begged she might be sent to France to finish her education. She was above two years in France, and as she refused to marry a count of the "aunt's" providing, she was disinherited, and sent back to her mother. When within a cable's length of the island, a hurricane dashed the ship to pieces, and the dead body of Virginia was thrown upon the shore. Paul drooped from grief, and within two months followed her to the grave.—Bernardin de St Pierre, Paul et Virginie (1788).

In Cobb's dramatic version, Paul's mother (Margaret) is made a faithful domestic of Virginia's parents. Virginia's mother dies, and commits her infant daughter to the care of Dominique, a faithful old negro servant, and Paul and Virginia are brought up in the belief that they are brother and sister. When Virginia is 15 years old, her aunt Leonora de Guzman adopts her, and sends don Antonio de Guardes to bring her to Spain, and make her his bride. She is taken by force on board ship, but scarcely has the ship started, when a hurricane dashes it on rocks, and it is wrecked. Alhambra, a runaway slave, whom Paul and Virginia had befriended, rescues Virginia, who is brought to shore and married to Paul, but Antonio is drowned (1756-1818).

Paul (Father), Paul Sarpi (1552-1628)

Paul (St) The very sword which cut off the head of this apostle is preserved at the convent of La Lila, near Toledo, in Spain. If any one doubts the fact, he may, for a gratuity, see a "copper sword, twenty-five inches long, and three and a half broad, on one side of which is the word BRUCIO ('a sword'), and on the other CAUTE." Can anything be more convincing?

Paul (The Second St), St Remi or Remigius, "The Great Apostle of the French." He was made bishop of Rheims when only 22 years old. It was St Remi who baptized Clovis, and told him that henceforth he must worship what he hitherto had hated, and abjure what he had hitherto adored (439-535).

* * The eruse employed by St Remi in the baptism of Clovis was used through the French monarchy in the anointing of all the kings.

Paul Pry, an idle, inquisitive, meddlesome fellow, who has no occupation of his own, and is for ever poking his nose into other people's affairs. He always comes in with the apology, "I hope I don't intrude."—John Poole, Paul Pry.

Thomas Hill, familiarly called "Tommy Hill," was the original of this character, and also of "Gilbert Gurney," by Theodore Hook. Planche says of Thomas Hill

His specialité was the accurate information he could impart on all the petty details of the domestic economy of his friends: the contents of their wardrobes, their printings, the number of pots of preserve in their store-closets, and of the table napkins in their linen presses, the dates of their births and marriages, the amounts of their trades men's bills, and whether paid weekly or quarterly. He had been on the press, and was connected with the Morning Chronicle. He used to drive Mathews crazy by ferret out his wife's recollections when he left London, and trying to get the information in some paper.—Recollections 1. 131-2.

Pauletta (The lady Trmnia), ward of Master George Heriot the king's goldsmith.—Sir W. Scott, The Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.).

Paulina, the noble-spirited wife of Antigonus a Sicilian lord, and the kind friend of queen Hermioné. When Hermioné gave birth in prison to a daughter, Paulina undertook to present it to king Leontés, hoping that his heart would be softened at the sight of his infant daughter, but he commanded the child to be cast out on a desert shore, and left there to perish. The child was drifted to the "coast" of Bohemia, and brought up by a shepherd, who called it Perdita Florizel, the son of king Polixénus, fell in love with her, and fled with her to Sicily, to escape the vengeance of the angry king. The fugitives being introduced to Leontés, it was soon discovered that Perdita was the king's daughter, and Polixénus consented to the union he had before forbidden. Paulina now invited Leontés and the rest to inspect a famous statue of Hermioné, and the statue turned out to be the living queen herself.—Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale (1604).

Paulina is clearer, generous, strong minded and warm hearted, fearless in asserting the truth, firm in her sense of right, enthusiastic in all her affections, quick in thought, resolute in word, and energetic in action, but heedless, hot tempered, impatient, loud, bold, reliable and turbulent of tongue.—Mrs. Jameson.

Pauline, "The Beauty of Lyons," daughter of Mon Deschappelles a Lyonsese merchant, "as pretty as Venus and as proud as Juno." Pauline rejected the suits of Beauseant, Glavis, and Claude Melnotte, and the three rejected lovers combined on vengeance. To this end, Claude, who was a gardener's son, pretended to be the prince Como, and Pauline married him, but was indignant when she discovered the trick which had been played upon her. Claude left her and entered the French army, where in two years and a half he rose to the rank of colonel. Returning to Lyons, he found his father-in-law on the eve of bankruptcy, and Pauline about to be sold to Beauseant for money to satisfy the creditors Being convinced that Pauline really loved him, Claude paid the money required, and claimed the lady as his loving and grateful wife—Lord L. B. Litton, The Lady of Lyons (1838)

Pauline (Mademoiselle) or MONNA PAULINE, the attendant of lady Imminia Pauletti the goldsmith's ward—Sir W. Scott, The Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.)

Paulinus of York christened 10 000 men, besides women and their children, in one single day in the Swale (Altogether some 50,000 souls, i.e. 101 every minute, 6250 every hour, supposing he worked eight hours without stopping)

Pauvre Jacques When Marie Antoinette had her artificial Swiss village in the "Little Trianon," a Swiss girl was brought over to heighten the illusion She was observed to pine, and was heard to sigh out, pauvre Jacques! This little romance pleased the queen, who sent for Jacques, and gave the pair a wedding portion, while the marchioness de Tra- vanet wrote the song called Pauvre Jacques, which created at the time quite a sensation The first and last verses run thus

*Pauvre Jacques quand j'étais près de toi
Je ne sentais pas ma misère
Mais à présent que tu vis loin de moi,
Je manque de tout sur la terre.*

Poor Jack, while I was near to thee,
Thou poor my bliss was unalloyed
But now thou dwellest so far from me,
The world appears a loneliness told.

Pa'via (Battle of) François I of France is said to have written to his mother these words after the loss of this battle "Madame, tout est perdu hors

Polly Peachum, daughter of Peachum (See POLLY) — J. Gay, The Beggar's Opera (1727)

Pearl. It is said that Cleopatra swallowed a pearl of more value than the whole of the banquet she had provided in honour of Antony. This she did when she drank to his health. The same sort of extravagant folly is told of Æsopus son of Clodius Æsopus the actor (Horace, Satire, II. 3)

A similar act of vanity and folly is ascribed to sir Thomas Gresham, when queen Elizabeth dined at the City banquet, for her visit to the Royal Exchange.

Peau de Chagrin, a story by Balzac. The hero becomes possessed of a magical wild ass's skin, which yields him the means of gratifying every wish, but for every wish thus gratified the skin shrunk somewhat, and at last vanished, having been wished entirely away. Life is a peau d'âne, for every vital act diminishes its force, and when all its force is gone, life is spent (1834)

Peck'sniff, "architect and land surveyor," at Salisbury. He talks homilies even in drunkenness, prates about the beauty of charity, and duty of forgiveness, but is altogether a canting humbug, and is ultimately so reduced in position that he becomes "a drunken, begging, squalid, letter-writing man," out at elbows, and almost shoeless. Peck'sniff's speciality was the "sleek, smiling, crawling abomination of hypocrisy."

If ever man combined within himself all the mild qualities of the lamb with a considerable touch of the dove, and not a dash of the crocodile, or the least possible suggestion of the very mildest reasoning of the serpent, that man was Mr Peck'sniff — the messenger of peace. — Ch. IV

Charity and Mercy Peck'sniff, the two daughters of the "architect and land surveyor." Charity is thin, ill-natured, and a shrew, eventually jilted by a weak young man, who really loves her sister Mercy Peck'sniff, usually called "Mertry."

Pèdre (Don), a Sicilian nobleman, who has a Greek slave of great beauty, named Isidore (3 syl). This slave is loved by Adraste (2 syl), a French gentleman, who gains access to the house under the guise of a portrait-painter. He next sends his slave Zaïde to complain to the Sicilian of ill-treatment, and don Pèdre volunteers to intercede on her behalf. At this moment Adraste comes up, and demands that Zaïde be given up to deserved chastisement. Pèdre pleads for her, Adraste appears to be pacified, and Pèdre calls for Zaïde to come forth. Isidore, in the veil of Zaïde, comes out, and Pèdre says, "There, take her home, and use her well." "I will do so," says Adraste, and leads off the Greek slave—Molière, Le Sicilien ou L'Amour Peintre (1667)

Peelers, the constabulary of Ireland, appointed under the Peace Preservation Act of 1814, proposed by sir Robert Peel. The name was subsequently given to the new police of England, who are also called "Bobbies" from sir Robert Peel.

Peep-o'-Day Boys, Irish insurgents of 1784, who prowled about at day-break, searching for arms.

Peeping Tom of Coventry. Lady Godiva earnestly besought her husband (Leofric earl of Mercia) to relieve the men of Coventry of their grievous oppressions. Leofric, annoyed at her importunity, told her he would do so when she had ridden on horseback, naked, through the town. The countess took him at his word, rode naked through the town, and Leofric was obliged to grant the men of Coventry a charter of freedom — Dagdale.

Ripin says that the countess commanded all persons to keep within doors and away from windows during her ride. One man, named Tom of Coventry, took a peep of the lady on horseback, but it cost him his life.

* * * Lennison, in his Godiva, has reproduced this story.

Peerage of the Saints In the preamble of the statutes instituting the Order of St Michael, founded by Louis XI in 1469, the archangel is styled "my lord," and created a knight. The apostles had been already ennobled and knighted. We read of "the earl Peter," "Count Paul," "the baron Stephen," and so on. Thus, in the introduction of a sermon upon St Stephen's Day, we have these lines:

Peerybingle (John), a carrier, "lumbering, slow, and honest, heavy, but light of spirit, rough upon the surface, but gentle at the core, dull without, but quick within, stolid, but so good. O mother Nature, give thy children the true poetry of heart that hid itself in this poor carrier's breast, and we can bear to have them talking prose all their life long."

Mrs [Mary] Peerybingle, called by her husband "Dot." She was a little chubby, cheery, young wife, very fond of her husband, and very proud of her baby, a good housewife, who delighted in making the house snug and cozy for John, when he came home after his day's work. She called him "a dear old darling of a dunce," or "her little goose." She sheltered Edward Plummer in her cottage for a time, and got into trouble, but the marriage of Edward with May Ilding cleared up the mystery, and John loved his little Dot more fondly than ever — C. Dickens, The Cricket on the Hearth (1845).

Peg Drink to your peg King Edgar ordered that "pegs should be fastened into drinking-horns at stated distances, and whoever drank beyond his peg at one draught should be obnoxious to a severe punishment."

I had lately a peg tankard in my hand. It had on the inside a row of eight pins, one above another from bottom to top. It held two quarts, so that there was a gill of liquor between peg and peg. Whoever drank short of his pin or beyond it was obliged to drink to the next, and so on till the tankard was drained to the bottom. — Sharpe History of the Kings of England.

Peg-a-Ramsey, the heroine of an old song. Percy says it was an indecent ballad. Shakespeare alludes to it in his Twelfth Night, act ii sc 3 (1611).

James I had been much struck with the beauty and embarrassment of the pretty Peg a Ramsey as he called her — Sir W. Scott.

Peg'asus, the winged horse of the Muses. It was caught by Bellerophon, who mounted thereon, and destroyed the Chimera, but when he attempted to ascend to heaven, he was thrown from the horse, and Pegasus mounted alone to the skies, where it became the constellation of the same name.

Being very plump whenever he made any little exert on after she was dressed, some of the buttons on the back of her gown flew off —Ch. II.

Dan'l Peggotty, brother of David Copperfield's nurse. Dan'l was a Yarmouth fisherman. His nephew Ham Peggotty, and his brother-in-law's child "little Em'ly," lived with him. Dan'l himself was a bachelor, and a Mrs Gummidge (widow of his late partner) kept house for him. Dan'l Peggotty was most tender-hearted, and loved little Em'ly with all his heart.

Ham Peggotty, nephew of Dan'l Peggotty, of Yarmouth, and son of Joe, Dan'l's brother. Ham was in love with little Em'ly, daughter of Tom (Dan's brother-in-law), but Steerforth stepped a between them, and stole Em'ly away. Ham Peggotty is represented as the very beau-ideal of an uneducated, simple-minded, honest, and warm-hearted fisherman. He was drowned in his attempt to rescue Steerforth from the sea.

Em'ly Peggotty, daughter of Dan's brother-in-law Tom. She was engaged to Ham Peggotty, but being fascinated with Steerforth, ran off with him. She was afterwards reclaimed, and emigrated to Australia with Dan'l and Mrs Gummidge —C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849).

Peggy, grandchild of the old widow Maclure, a coventanter —Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II.)

Peggy, the laundry-maid of colonel Mannering at Woodburne —Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II.)

Peggy [Thrift], the orphan daughter of sir Thomas Thrift of Hampshire, and the ward of Moody, who brings her up in perfect seclusion in the country. When Moody is 50 and Peggy 19, the guardian tries to marry her, but "the country girl" outwits him, and marries Belville, a young man of more suitable age. Peggy calls her guardian "Bud." She is very simple but sharp, ingenious but crafty, lively and girlish —The Country Girl (Garriek, altered from W. Kercher's Country Wife, 1675).

Mrs Jordan (1782-1816) made her first appearance in London at Drury Lane in 1785. The character she selected was "Peggy," her success was immediate, her salary doubled, and she was allowed two benefits —W. G. Puxell Representative Actors.

Pegler (Mrs), mother of Josiah Bonnderby, Esq, banker and mill owner, called "The Bully of Humility." The son allows the old woman £30 a year to keep out of sight —C. Dickens, Hard Times (1854).

Pek'uah, the attendant of princess Nekalah, of the "happy valley." She accompanied the princess in her wanderings, but refused to enter the great pyramid, and, while the princess was exploring the chambers, was carried off by some Arabs. She was afterwards ransomed for 200 ounces of gold —Dr Johnson, Rasselas (1759).

Pelay'o (Prince), son of Faval'a, founder of the Spanish monarchy after the overthrow of Roderick last of the Gothic kings. He united, in his own person, the royal lines of Spain and of the Goths.

In him the old Iberian blood
Of royal and remotest ancestry
From an happy source flowed undefiled
He too of Chindasultho's royal line
Whole remnant now drew after him the love
Of all true Goths.

Southey Roderick, etc. v. 11 (1814).

Pelham, the hero of a novel by Lord Lytton, entitled Pelham or The Adventures of a Gentleman (1828).

Pelham (M), one of the many aliases of sir R. Phillips, under which he published The Parent's and Tutor's First Catechism. In the preface he calls the writer authoriss. Some of his other names are Rev David Blair, Rev C. C. Clarke, Rev J. Goldsmith.

Pel'ian Spear (The), the lance of Achilles which wounded and cured Lelephos. So called from Peleus the father of Achilles.

Such was the cure the Arcadian hero found—
The Pelian spear that wounded made him sound.
Orld Remedy of Love

Pel'ides (3 syl), Achilles, son of Peleus (2 syl), chief of the Greek warriors at the siege of Troy —Homer, Iliad.

When like Pel'ides, bold beyond control
Homer raised high to heaven the loud impetuous song.
Leattle The Minstrel (1734).

Pel'ion ("mud-sprung"), one of the frog chieftains.

A spear at Iellon Troglodytes cast
The missile spear within the bottom part
Death's sable shades the fainting frog surround
And life's red tide runs ebbing from the wound,
Farnell Battle of the Frogs and Mice III (about 1712).

Pell (Solomon), an attorney in the Insolvent Debtors' court. He has the very highest opinions of his own merits, and by his aid Tony Weller contrives to get his son Sam sent to the Fleet for debt, that he may be near Mr Pickwick to protect and wait upon him —C. Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Pelleas (Sir), lord of many isles, and noted for his great muscular strength. He fell in love with lady Ettard, but the lady did not return his love. Sir Gawain promised to advocate his cause with the lady, but played him false. Sir Pelleas caught them in unseemly dalliance with each other, but forbore to kill them. By the power of enchantment, the lady was made to dote on sir Pelleas, but the knight would have nothing to say to her, so she pined and died. After the lady Ettard played him false, the Damsel of the Lake "rejoiced him, and they loved together during their whole lives"—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 179-82 (1470).

* * Sir Pelleas must not be confounded with sir Pelles (q v).

Pellegrin, the pseudonym of Lemotte Louqué (1777-1843).

Pelles (Sir), of Corbin Castle, "king of the foraging land and nigh cousin of Joseph of Arimathy." He was father of sir Eliazar, and of the lady Flaime who fell in love with sir Launcelot, by whom she became the mother of sir Galahad "who achieved the quest of the holy grail." This Flaime was not the "lily maid of Astolat."

While sir Launcelot was visiting king Pelles, a glimpse of the holy grail was vouchsafed them.

For when they went into the castle to take their rest, there came a dove to the window and in her bill was a little censer of gold and there within was such a savour as though all the spicery of the world had been there. And a damsel, passing fair, bare a vessel of gold between her hands, and thereto the king kneeled devoutly and said his prayers. "Oh mercy!" said sir Launcelot, "what may this mean?" This, said the king, "is the holy Sancgreal which ye have seen."—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur III. 2 (140).

Pellinore (Sir), king of the Isles and knight of the Round Table (pt. 1, 57). He was a good man of power, was called "The Knight with the Stranger Beast," and slew king Lot of Orkney, but was himself slain ten years afterwards by sir Gawaine, one of Lot's sons (pt. 1, 35). Sir Pellinore (3 syl.) had, by the wife of Arics the cowherd, a son named sir Tor, who was the first knight of the Round Table created by king Arthur (pt. 1, 47, 48), one daughter, Lien, by the Lady of Rule (pt. 11, 10), and three sons in lawful wedlock, sir Agloulale (sometimes called Aglavalde, probably a clerical error), sir Lamorahe Dornar (also called sir Lamorahe de Galis), and sir Percivale de Galis (pt. 11, 108). The widow succeeded to the throne (pt. 11, 10).—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470).

Milton calls the name "Pellenore" (2 syl.)

Fair damsels, met in forests wide
By knights of Logres or of Lyones,
Lancelot, or Pelleas or Pellenore.

Milton.

Pelob'ates (4 syl.), one of the frog champions. The word means "mud-wader." In the battle he flings a heap of mud against Psycarpus, the Hector of the mice, and half blinds him, but the warrior mouse heaves a stone "whose bulk would need ten degenerate mice of modern days to lift," and the mass, falling on the "mud-wader," breaks his leg.—Parnell, Battle of the Frogs and Mice, 111 (about 1712).

Pel'ops' Shoulder, story. The tale is that Demeter ate the shoulder of Pelops when it was served up by Tan'talos for food. The gods restored Pelops to life by putting the dismembered body into a caldron, but found that it lacked a shoulder, whereupon Demeter supplied him with an ivory shoulder, and all his descendants bore this distinctive mark.

N.B.—It will be remembered that Pythagoras had a golden thigh.

Your forehead high
And smooth as Pelops' shoulder
John Fletcher The Faithful Shepherdess II. 1 (1610)

Pelorus, Sicily, strictly speaking the north-east promontory of that island, called Capo di Faro, from a pharos or lighthouse to Poseidon, which once stood there.

So reels Pelorus with convulsive throes,
And his base rocks in foam and blood lie.

(30).

Pelos, father of Physignathos king of the frogs. The word means "mud."—Parnell, Battle of the Frogs and Mice (about 1712).

Pembroke (The earl of), uncle to sir Aymer de Valence.—Sir W. Scott, Castle Dangerous (time, Henry I.).

Pembroke (The Rev. Mr.), chaplain at Waverley Honour.—Sir W. Scott, Waverley (time, George II.).

Pen, Philemon Holland, translator-general of the classics. Of him was the epigram written.

Holland with his translations doth so fill us
He will not let Suetonius be Tranquillus.

(The point of which is, of course, that the name of the Roman historian was C. Suetonius Tranquillus.)

Many of these translations were written from beginning to end with one pen, and hence he himself wrote

With one and pen I writ this book,
Made of a grey goose-quill,
A pen I was when I took
And a pen I leave it still.

Pendennis, a novel by Thackeray (1849), in which much of his own history and experience is recorded with a novelist's licence. The hero, Arthur Pendennis, reappears in the Adventures of Philip, and is represented as telling the story of The Newcomes. Arthur Pendennis stands in relation to Thackeray as David Copperfield does to Charles Dickens.

Arthur Pendennis, a young man of ardent feelings and lively intellect, but self-conceited and selfish. He has a keen sense of honour, and a capacity for loving, but altogether he is not an attractive character.

Laura Pendennis. This is one of the best of Thackeray's characters.

Major Pendennis, a tuft-hunter, who turns on his patrons for the sake of wedging himself into their society — Thackeray, The History of Pendennis (1850).

Pendragon, probably a title meaning "chief leader in war." Drajon is Welsh for a "leader in war," and pen for "head" or "chief." The title was given to Uther, brother of Constantine, and father of prince Arthur. Like the word "Pharaoh," it is used as a proper name without the article — Geoffrey of Monmouth, Chron., vi (1112).

Once I read,
That stout Pendragon in his latter sick,
Came to the bed I and tranquilly his form,
Shakespeare Henry VI. act i. l. 2 (1159)

Penelope's Web, a work that never progresses. Penelope, the wife of Ulysses, being importuned by several suitors during her husband's long absence, made reply that she could not marry again, even if Ulysses were dead, till she had finished weaving a shroud for her aged father-in-law. Every night she pulled out what she had woven during the day, and thus the shroud made no progress towards completion — Greek Mythology.

The French say of a work "never ending, still beginning," c'est l'ouvrage de Penelope.

Penel'ophon, the beggar loved by king Cophetua. Shakespeare calls the name Zenelophon in Love's Labour's Lost, act iv sc 1 (1594) — Percy, Rhiques, I. ii. 6 (1765).

Penelva (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series called Le Roman des Romains, pertaining to "Ambradus of Gaul." This part was added by an anonymous Portuguese (fifteenth century).

Penfeather (Lady Penelope), the lady patroness at the Spr — Sir W. Scott, St. Iwan's Well (time, George III).

Pengwern (The Torch of), prince Gwenwyn of Powys-land — Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II).

Pengwinion (Mr.), from Cornwall, a Jacobite conspirator with Mr. Redgauntlet — Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III).

Peninsular War (The), the war carried on by Sir Arthur Wellesley against Napoleon in Portugal and Spain (1808-1811).

Southey wrote a History of the Peninsular War (1822-32).

Penitents of Love (Fraternity of the), an institution established in Languedoc in the thirteenth century, consisting of knights and esquires, dames and damsels, whose object was to prove the excess of their love by bearing, with invincible constancy, the extremes of heat and cold. They passed the greater part of the day abroad, wandering about from castle to castle, wherever they were summoned by the inviolable duties of love and gallantry, so that many of these devotees perished by the inclemency of the weather, and received the crown of martyrdom to their profession — See Warton, History of English Poetry (1781).

Penlake (Richard), a cheerful man, both frank and free, but married to Rebecca a terrible shrew. Rebecca knew if she once sat in St. Michael's chair (on St. Michael's Mount, in Cornwall), that she would rule her husband ever after, so she was very desirous of going to the mount. It so happened that Richard fell sick, and both vowed to give six marks to St. Michael if he recovered. Richard did recover, and they visited the shrine, but while Richard was making the offering, Rebecca ran to seat herself in St. Michael's chair, but no sooner had she done so, than she fell from the chair, and was killed in the fall — Southey, St. Michael's Chair (a ballad, 1798).

Penniless (The), Maximilian I emperor of Germany (1459, 1493-1519)

Penny (Joc!), a highway man—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Penruddock (Roderick), a "philosopher," or rather a recluse, who spent his time in reading. By nature gentle, kind-hearted, and generous, but soured by wrongs. Woodville, his trusted friend, although he knew that Arabella was betrothed to Roderick, induced her father to give his daughter to himself, the richer man, and Roderick's life was blasted. Woodville had a son, who reduced himself to positive indigence by gambling, and Sir George Penruddock was the chief creditor. Sir George dying, all his property came to his cousin Roderick, who now had ample means to glut his revenge on his treacherous friend, but his heart softened. First, he settled all "the obligations, bonds, and mortgages, covering the whole Woodville property," on Henry Woodville, that he might marry Emily Lempest, and next, he restored to Mrs Woodville "her settlement, which, in her husband's desperate necessity, she had resigned to him," lastly, he sold all his own estates, and retired again to a country cottage to his books and solitude—Cumberland, The Wheel of Fortune (1779)

Who has seen J Kemble (1757-1823) in Penruddock? and not shed tears from the deepest sources? His tenderly pulling away the son of his treacherous friend

Trench Femulus (1822)

Pentap'olin, "with the naked arm," king of the Garamantians, who always went to battle with his right arm bare. Alisanfaron emperor of Trap'oban wished to marry his daughter, but, being refused, resolved to urge his suit by the sword. When don Quixote saw two flocks of sheep coming along the road in opposite directions, he told Sancho Panza they were the armies of these two puissant monarchs met in array against each other—Cervantes, Don Quixote, I in 4 (1605)

Pentecôte Vivante (La), cardinal Mezzofanti, who was the master of fifty or fifty-eight languages (1774-1849)

Penthes'a, sister of Ithoelcs, betrothed to Or'gulus by the consent of her father. At the death of her father, Ithoclés compelled her to marry Bass' anes whom she hated, and she starved herself to death—John Ford, The Broken Heart (1633)

Penthesile'a, queen of the Amazons, slain by Achilles. S Butler calls the name "Penthes'ilê"

And laid about in fight more bravely
Than the Amazonian dame Penthesile
S Butler Mudbray

Pen'theus (3 syl), a king of Thebes, who tried to abolish the orgies of Bacchus, but was driven mad by the offended god. In his madness he climbed into a tree to witness the rites, and being desecrated was torn to pieces by the Bacchantes

As when wild Pentheus grown mad with fear
Whole troops of hellish hags about him spies
Coles Fletcher Christ's Triumph over Death (1610)

Pen'theus (2 syl), king of Thebes, resisted the introduction of the worship of Dion'sos (Bacchus) into his kingdom, in consequence of which the Breechantes pulled his palace to the ground, and Pentheus, driven from the throne, was torn to pieces on mount Citheron by his own mother and her two sisters

He the fate [m/sing]
Of sober Pentheus.
Akenside Hymn to the Muses (1767)

Pentweazel (Alderman), a rich City merchant of Blowbladder Street. He is wholly submissive to his wife, whom he always addresses as "Chuck"

Mrs Pentweazel, the alderman's wife, very ignorant, very vain, and very conceitedly humble. She was a Griskin by birth, and "all her family by the mother's side were famous for their eyes." She had an aunt among the beauties of Windsor, "a perdition fine woman. She had but one eye, but that was a piercer, and got her three husbands. We was called the gimlet family." Mrs Pentweazel says her first likeness was done after "Venus de Medieis the sister of Mary de Medieis"

Suey Pentweazel, daughter of the alderman recently married to Mr Deputy Dripping of Candlewick Yard

Carol Pentweazel, a schoolboy, who had been under Dr Jerks, near Doncaster, for two years and a quarter, and had learnt all As in Present by heart. The terms of this school were £10 a year for food, books, board, clothes, and tuition—Foote, Taste (1753)

Peon'ia or Pæon'ia, Macedonia, so called from Pæon son of Endymion

Made Macedonia first stoop then Thessaly and Thracia
His soldiers there enriched with all Pæonia's spoil
Dryden, Polycriton, vill. (1612)

People (Man of the), Charles James Fox (1749-1806)

Pepin (William), a White friar and most famous preacher at the beginning of the sixteenth century. His sermons, in eight volumes quarto, formed the grand repertory of the preachers of those times

Qui nescit Peplnare nescit predicare—Proverb

Pepper Gate, a gate on the east side of the city of Chester. It is said that the daughter of the mayor eloped, and the mayor ordered the gate to be closed. Hence the proverb, When your daughter is stolen, close Pepper Gate, or in other words, Lock the stable door when the steed is stolen—Albert Smith, Christopher Tadpole, 1

Pepperpot (Sir Peter), a West Indian epicure, immensely rich, conceited, and irritable—Foote, The Patron (1764)

Peppers (See WHITE HORSE OF THE PLIERS)

Peps (Dr Parley), a court physician who attended the first Mrs Dombey on her death-bed. Dr Peps always gave his patients (by mistake, of course), a title, to impress them with the idea that his practice was exclusively confined to the upper ten thousand—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846).

Perceforest (King), the hero of a prose romance "in Greek." The MS is said to have been found by count William of Hainault in a cabinet at "Burtimer" Abbey, on the Humber, and in the same cabinet was deposited a crown, which the count sent to king Edward. The MS was turned into Latin by St Landelin, and thence into French under the title of La Tres Elegante Delicieux Melliflue et Tres Plaisante Hystoire du Tres Noble Roy Perceforest (printed at Paris in 1528)

(Of course, this pretended discovery is only an invention. An analysis of the romance is given in Dunlop's History of Fiction.)

He was called "Perceforest" because he dared to pierce, almost alone, an enchanted forest, where women and children were most evilly entreated. Charles IX of France was especially fond of this romance.

Perch, messenger in the house of Mr Dombey, merchant, whom he adored, and plainly showed by his manner to the great man "You are the light of my eyes," "You are the breath of my soul"—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1846)

Perche Notary (A), a lawyer who sets people together by the ears, one who makes more quarrels than contracts. The French proverb is, Notaire du Perche, qui passe plus d'échalliers que de contrats

Le Perche qui se trouve partagé entre les départements de l'Orne et d'Eure-et-Loir est un contrée fort boisée dans laquelle la plupart des champs sont entourés de haies, dans lesquelles sont ménagées certaines ouvertures propres à donner passage aux piétons seulement, et que l'on nomme échalliers—Maitre le Gal.

Percinet, a fairy prince, in love with Graciosa. The prince succeeds in thwarting the malicious designs of Grognon, the step-mother of the lovely princess—Percinet and Graciosa (a fairy tale)

Percival (Sir), the third son of sir Pellinore king of Wales. His brothers were sir Aglavalde and sir Lamorak. Dornar, usually called sir Lamorak de Galis (Wales). Sir Tor was his half-brother. Sir Percival caught a sight of the holy grail after his combat with sir Ector de Maris (brother of sir Launcelot), and both were miraculously healed by it. Crétien de Troyes wrote the Roman de Percival (before 1200), and Menessier produced the same story in a metrical form (See PARVIA)

Sir Percival had a glimmering of the Sanguine and of the Golden that bore it, for he was perfect and clean. And forthwith they were both as whole of limb and lit to as ever they were in their life days. "Oh mercy!" said sir Percival, "what may this mean?" "I wot well," said sir Ector. "It is the holy vessel wherein is a part of the holy blood of our blessed Saviour; but it may not be seen but by a perfect man"—L. III. 14.

Sir Percival was with sir Bors and sir Galahad when the visible Saviour went into the consecrated water which was given to them by the bishop. This is called the achievement of the quest of the holy grail (pt in 101, 102)—Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470)

Percy Arundel lord Ashdale, son of lady Arundel by her second husband. A hot, fiery youth, proud and overbearing. When grown to manhood, a "sea-captain," named Norman, made love to Violet, lord Ashdale's cousin. The young "Hotspur" was indignant and somewhat jealous, but discovered that Norman was the son of lady Arundel by her first husband, and the heir to the title and estates. In the end, Norman agreed to divide the property equally, but claimed Violet for his bride—Lord Lytton, The Sea-Captain (1839)

Per'dita, the daughter of the queen

Hermioné, born in prison. Her father, king Leontés, commanded the infant to be cast on a desert shore, and left to perish there. Being put to sea, the vessel was driven by a storm to the "coast" of Bohemia, and the infant child was brought up by a shepherd, who called its name Perdita. Florizel, the son of the Bohemian king, fell in love with Perdita, and courted her under the assumed name of Doricls, but the king, having tracked his son to the shepherd's hut, told Perdita that if she did not at once discontinue this foolery, he would command her and the shepherd too to be put to death. Florizel and Perdita now fled from Bohemia to Sicily, and being introduced to the king, it was soon discovered that Perdita was Leontés's daughter. The Bohemian king, having tracked his son to Sicily, arrived just in time to hear the news, and gave his joyful consent to the union which he had before forbidden.—Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale (1604)

Perdita, Mrs Mary Robinson (born Darby), the victim of George IV while prince of Wales. She first attracted his notice while acting the part of "Perdita," and the prince called himself "Florizel." George prince of Wales settled a pension for life on her, £500 a year for herself, and £200 a year for her daughter. She caught cold one winter, and, losing the use of her limbs, could neither walk nor stand (1758-1799, not 1800 as is given usually.)

She was unquestionably very beautiful but more so in the face than in the figure, and she had a remarkable facility in adapting her deportment to dress. To-day she was a pygmalion with a straw hat tied at the back of her head. Yesterday she had been the dressed belle of Hyde Park, trimmed powdered, pitched, painted to the utmost power of rouge and white lead. To-morrow she would be the cravated Amazon of the riding house, but be she what she might the hats of the fashionable promenaders swept the ground as she passed. When he rode forth in her high phœton three candidates and her husband were outriders.—Mrs. Hawkins, Memora (1809)

Perdrix, toujours Perdrix! Walpole tells us that the confessor of one of the French kings, having reproved the monarch for his conjugal infidelities, was asked what dish he liked best. The confessor replied, "Partridges," and the king had partridges served to him every day, till the confessor got quite sick of them. "Perdrix, toujours perdrix!" he would exclaim, as the dish was set before him. After a time, the king visited him, and hoped his favourite dish had been supplied him. "Mais oui," he replied, "tonjours perdrix, toujours perdrix!" "Ah, ah!" said the amorous monarch,

"and one mistress is all very well, but not perdrix, toujours perdrix!"—See Notes and Queries, 337, October 23, 1869

The story is at least as old as the Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles, compiled between 1450-1461, for the amusement of the dauphin of France, afterwards Louis XI (Notes and Queries, November 27, 1869)

 Farquhar parodies the French expression into, "Soup for breakfast, soup for dinner, soup for supper, and soup for breakfast again"—Farquhar, The Inconstant, iv 2 (1702)

Père Duchesne (Le), Jacques René Hébert, so called from the Père Duchesne, a newspaper of which he was the editor (1755-1794)

Peread (Sir), the Black Knight of the Black Lands. Called by Tennyson, "Night" or "Nox." He was one of the four brothers who kept the passages to Castle Perilous, and was overthrown by Sir Gareth—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 126 (1470), Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette") Peredur (Sir), son of Eyrwne, called "sir Peredur of the Long Spear," one of the knights of the Round Table. He was for many years called "The Dumb Youth," from a vow he made to speak to no Christian till Angharad of the Golden Hand loved him better than she loved any other man. His great achievements were (1) the conquest of the Black Oppressor, "who oppressed every one and did justice to no one," (2) killing the Addanc of the Lake a monster that devoured duly some of the sons of the king of Tortures; this exploit he was enabled to achieve by means of a stone which kept him invisible, (3) slaying the three hundred heroes privileged to sit round the countess of the Achievements on the death of these men, the seat next the countess was freely given to him, (4) the achievement of the Mount of Mourning, where was a serpent with a stone in its tail which would give inexhaustible wealth to its possessor. Sir Peredur killed the serpent, but gave the stone to his companion, earl Llyw of the east country. These exploits over, sir Peredur lived fourteen years with the empress Cristinobyl the Great.

Sir Peredur is the Welsh name for Sir Percival of Wales—The Mabinogion (from the Red Book of Hergest, twelfth century)

Per'egrine (5 syl.), a sentimental prig, who tall s by the book. At the age of 17, he runs away from home, and Job Thoraberry lends him ten guineas, "the first earnings of his trade as a brizier." After thirty years' absence, Peregrine returns, just as the old brizier is made a bankrupt "through the treachery of a friend." He tells the bankrupt that his loan of ten guineas has by honest trade grown to 10,000, and these he returns to Thoraberry as his own by right. It turns out that Peregrine is the eldest brother of Sir Simon Rochdale, 1 P., and when Sir Simon refuses justice to the old brizier, Peregrine asserts his right to the estate, etc. At the same time, he hears that the ship he thought was wrecked has come safe into port, and has thus brought him £100,000.—G. Colman, junior, John Bull (1805)

Peregrine Pickle, the hero and title of a novel by Smollett (1751). Peregrine Pickle is a savage, ungrateful spendthrift, fond of practical jokes, and suffering with evil temper the misfortunes brought on himself by his own wilfulness.

Peregrinus Proteus, a comic philosopher, born at Parium, on the Hellespont. After a youth spent in debauchery and crimes, he turned Christian, and, to obliterate the memory of his youthful ill practices, divided his inheritance among the people. Ultimately he burned himself to death in public at the Olympic games, A.D. 165. Lucian has held up this immolation to ridicule in his Death of Peregrinus, and C. M. Wieland has an historic romance in German entitled Peregrinus Proteus (1733-1813).

Peres (Gil), a canon, and the eldest brother of Gil Blas's mother. Gil was a little punchy man, three feet and a half high, with his head sunk between his shoulders. He lived well, and brought up his nephew and godchild Gil Blas. "In so doing, Peres taught himself also to read his breviary without stumbling." He was the most illiterate canon of the whole chapter.—Lesage, Gil Blas, 1 (1715).

Perez (Michael), the "copper captain," a brave Spanish soldier, duped into marrying Estifania, a servant of intrigue, who passed herself off as a lady of property. Being reduced to great extremities, Estifania pawned the clothes and valuables of her husband, but these "valuables" were but of little worth—a jewel which sparkled as the "light of a dark lantern," a "chain of whittings' eyes" for pearls, and as for his clothes, she trustingly says to her husband

Put these and them (his jewels) on and you're a man of copper

W. Beckford, W. et al. (1787)

Perichola, the heroine of Offenbach's comic operetta. She is a street singer of Lima, in Peru.

Perichole (Ja), the chate amie of the late viceroys of Peru. She was a foreigner, and gave great offence by calling, in her bad Spanish, the creole ladies pericholas, which means "sauntering and bedeviled creatures." They, in retaliation, nicknamed the favourite Ja Perichole.

Pericles, the Athenian who raised himself to royal supremacy (died B.C. 429). On his death-bed he overheard his friends recalling his various merits, and told them they had forgotten his greatest praise, viz., that no Athenian through his administration had had to put on mourning, i.e. he had caused no one to be put to death.

Pericles was a true man of war
Yet at his death he rather did rejoice
In clemency Do still! quoth he "you grave Athenians"

(Who whistled and told his valiant acts)

You have forgot my greatest glory got

For yet by me no man wore mourning

Was never seen a mourning garment worn"

G. G. Colgate The Steele Glas (died 1577)

Pericles prince of Tyre, a voluntary exile, in order to avert the calamities which Antiochus emperor of Greece vowed against the Tyrians. Pericles, in his wanderings, first came to Tarsus, where he relieved from famine, but was obliged to quit the city to avoid the persecution of Antiochus. He was then shipwrecked, and cast on the shore of Pentapolis, where he distinguished himself in the public games, and being introduced to the king, fell in love with the princess Thaisa and married her. At the death of Antiochus, he returned to Tyre, but his wife, supposed to be dead in giving birth to a daughter (Marina), is thrown into the sea. Periclês entrusted his infant child to Cleon (governor of Tarsus) and his wife Dionysia, who brought her up excellently well till she became a young woman, when Dionysia employed a man to murder her, and when Periclês came to see her, he was shown a splendid sepulchre which had been raised to her honour. On his return home, the ship stopped at Metalinê, and Marina was introduced to Periclês to divert his melancholy. She told him the tale of her life, and he discovered that she was his daughter. Marina was now betrothed to Lysimachus governor of Metalinê, and the party, going to the shrine of Diana of Ephesus to return thanks to the goddess, discovered the priestess to be Thaisa, the wife of Periclês and mother of Marina — Shakespeare, Pericles Prince of Tyre (1608).

 This is the story of Ismene and Ismenias, by Eustathius. The tale was known to Gower by the translation of Geoffrey Viterbo (See GESTA ROMANORUM).

Perigort (Cardinal) Previous to the battle of Poitiers, he endeavours to negotiate terms with the French king, but the only terms he can obtain, he tells prince Edward, are

That to the castles, town, and plunder taken
And offered now by you to be restored,
Your royal person with a hundred knights
Are to be added prisoners at discretion.

Shirley Lionard the Black Prince, iv 2 (1640)

Perigot (the t pronounced so as to rhyme with not), a shepherd in love with Amoret, but the shepherdess Amnillis also loves him, and, by the aid of the Sullen Shepherd, gets transformed into the exact likeness of the modest Amoret. By her wanton conduct, she disgusts Perigot, who casts her off, and by and by, meeting Amoret, whom he believes to be the same person, rejects her with scorn, and even wounds her with intent to kill. Ultimately the truth is discovered by Corin, "the faithful shepherdess," and the lovers, being reconciled, are married to each other — John Fletcher, The Faithful Shepherdess (1610).

Periklym'enos, son of Neleus (2 syl.) He had the power of changing his form into a bird, beast, reptile, or insect. As a bee, he perched on the chariot of Heraklès (Herculès), and was killed.

Perillos, of Athens, made a brzen bull for Phalaris tyrant of Agrigentum, intended for the execution of criminals. They were to be shut up in the bull, and the metal of the bull was to be made red hot. The cries of the victims inside were so reverberated as to resemble the roarings of a gigantic bull. Phalaris made the first experiment by shutting up the inventor himself in his own bull.

What's a protector?

A tragic actor. Cæsar in a clown

John Cleveland, A Definition of a Protector (died 1630)

Perilous Castle The castle of lord Douglas was so called in the reign of Edward I, because the good lord Douglas destroyed several English garrisons stationed there, and vowed to be revenged on any one who dared to take possession of it. Sir W. Scott calls it "Castle Dangerous" in his novel so entitled.

 In the story of Gareth and Lynet, the castle in which Lionès was held prisoner by sir Ironside the Red Knight of the Red Lands, was called Castle Perilous. The passages to the castle were held by four knights, all of whom sir Gareth overthrew, lastly he conquered sir Ironside, liberated the lady, and married her — Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 120-153 (1470).

Perim'ones (Sir), the Red Knight, one of the four brothers who kept the passages to Castle Perilous. He was overthrown by sir Gareth. Tennyson calls him "Noonday Sun" or "Mercuries" — Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 129 (1470), Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette").

Perion, king of Gaul, father of Amadis of Gaul. His "exploits and adventures" form part of the series called Le Roman des Romans. This part was added by Juan Diaz (fifteenth century).

 It is generally thought that "Gaul" in this romance is the same as Galis, that is, "Wales."

Perissa, the personification of extravagance, step-sister of Flissa (meanness) and of Medi'na (the golden mean), but they never agreed in any single thing. Perissa's suitor is sir Haddibras, a man "more huge in strength than wise in works" (Greek, perissos, "extravagant," perissotês, "excess") — Spenser, Faëry Queen, ii 2 (1590).

Periwinkle (Mr), one of the four guardians of Anne Lovely the heiress.

He is a "silly, half-titted virtuoso, positive and surly, fond of everything antique and foreign, and wears clothes of the fashion of the last century." Mr Periwinkle dotes upon travellers, and believes more of sir John Manderville than of the Bible" (act 1 1). Colonel Feignwell, to obtain his consent to his marriage with Mr Periwinkle's ward, disguised himself as an Egyptian, and passed himself off as a great traveller. His dress, he said, "belonged to the famous Claudius Ptolemy, who lived in the year 135." One of his curiosities was polysio'no, "part of those waves which bore Cleopatra's vessel, when she went to meet Antony." Another was the rocas masphoroi, or girdle of invisibility. His trick, however, miscarried, and he then personated Pillage, the steward of Periwinkle's father, and obtained Periwinkle's signature to the marriage by a snare — Mrs Centlivre, A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Porker (Mr), the lawyer employed for the defence in the famous suit of "Bardell v Pickwick" for breach of promise — C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Perlan Warbeck, an historic play or "chronicle history," by John Ford (1631)

Pernelle (Madame), mother of Orgon, a regular wren, who interrupts every one, without waiting to hear what was to have been said to her — Molière, Tartuffe (1664)

Peronella, a pretty country lass, who chooses places with an old decrepit quack. Peronella rejoices for a time in the idleness paid to her rank, but gladly resumes her beauty, youth, and rags — A Lark Tale

Perrette and Her Milk-Pail. Perrette, carrying her milk-pail well-poised upon her head, began to speculate on its value. She would sell the milk and buy eggs, she would set the eggs and rear chickens, the chickens she would sell and buy a pig, thus she would fatten and change for a cow and calf, and would it not be delightful to see the little calf skip and play? So saying, she gave a skip, let the milk-pail fall, and all the milk ran to waste. "Le lait tombe. Adieu, veau, vache, cochon, couvée," and poor Perrette "va s'excuser à son mari, en grand danger d'être battue."

Quel esprit ne ha la campagne?
Quel ne fait chasser en Espagne?
Morocho e (g r) Pyrrhus, la laillire enfa tous
Aucun les sages que les fous.
Quelque accident fait il que je rentre en moi même,
Je suis Gros-Jean comme devant.
Lafontaine Fables (La laillire e' lo Po' an fait" 1693).

(Dodder has this fable, and makes his milkmaid speculate on the gown she would buy with her money. It should be green, and all the young fellows would ask her to dance, but she would toss her head at them all—but ah! in tossing her head she tossed over her milk-pail.)

* * * Lechepron, an old soldier, related this fable to the advisers of King Picrochole, when they persuaded the king to go to war. A shoemaker bought a haporth of mill, thus he intended to make into butter, and with the money thus obtained he would buy a cow. The cow in due time would have a calf, the calf was to be sold, and the man when he became a rabob would marry a princess, only the jug fell, the milk was spilt, and the dreamer went supperless to bed — La Fontaine, Gargantua, 1 33 (1533)

In a similar day-dream, Alnaschar invested all his money in a basket of glass-ware, which he intended to sell, and buy other wares, till by barter he became a princely merchant, when he should marry the vizier's daughter. Being offended with his wife, he became so excited that he kicked out his foot, smashed all his wares, and remained wholly penniless — Arabian Nights ("The Barber's Fifth Brother")

Perrin, a peasant, the son of Thibaut — Molière, Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666)

Persaunt of India (Sir), the Blue Knight, called by Tennyson "Morning Star" or "Phosphorus." One of the four brothers who kept the passages to Castle Perilous Overthrown by Sir Gareth — Sir T Malory, History of Prince Arthur, 1 131 (1470), Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette")

* * * It is manifestly a blunder to call the Blue Knight "Morning Star" and the Green Knight "Evening Star." The old romance makes the combat with the "Green Knight" at dawn, and with the "Blue Knight" at sunset. The error arose from not bearing in mind that our forefathers began the day with the preceding eve, and ended it at sunset.

Perseus [Per seos], a famous Argive hero, whose exploits resemble those of Hercules, and hence he was called "The Argive Hercules."

The best work of Benvenuto Cellini is a bronze statue of Perseus, in the Loggia del Lanzi, of Florence

Perseus's Horse, a ship Perseus, having cut off Medusa's head, made the ship Pegasê, the swiftest ship hitherto known, and generally called "Perseus's flying horse"

The thick ribbed bark thro' liquid mountains cut
Like Perseus's horse.
Shakespeare Troilus and Cressida act I. sc. 3 (1609)

Persian Creed (The) Zoroaster supposes there are two gods or spirit-principles—one good and the other evil. The good is Yezad, and the evil Ahriman

Les mages reconnaissent deux principes, un bon et un mauvais le premier auteur de tout bien et l'autre auteur de tout mal. Ils nomment le bon principe Yezad ou Yezdam, ce que les Grecs, ont traduit par Oromasdes et le mauvais Ahriman en Grec Ariman nls—Noté Dicte de la Fable art. Arimane.

And that same doctrine of the Persian
Of the two principles but leaves behind
As many doubts as any other doctrine.

Byron Don Juan xlii 41 (1824)

Perth (The Fair Maid of), Catharine or Katie Glover, "universally acknowledged to be the most beautiful young woman of the city or its vicinity." Catharine was the daughter of Simon Glover (the glover of Perth), and married Henry Smith the armourer—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.)

Pertinax (Sir) (See MACSYCO-PHANT)

Pertolope (Sir), the Green Knight. One of the four brothers who kept the passages to Castle Perilous. He was overthrown by Sir Gareth. Tennyson calls him "Evening Star" or "Hesperus"—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i 127 (1470), Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette")

* * * It is evidently a blunder to call the Green Knight "Evening Star" and the Blue Knight "Morning Star." In the original tale the combat with the "Green Knight" was at dawn, and with the "Blue Knight" at sunset. The error arose from not recollecting that day began in olden times with the preceding eve, and ended at sunset.

Perviz (Prince), son of the sultan Khroson-schar of Persia. At birth he was taken away by the sultana's sisters, and set adrift on a canal, but was rescued and brought up by the superintendent of the sultan's gardens. When grown to manhood, "the talking bird" told the sultan that Perviz was his son, and the young prince, with his brother and sister, were restored to their rank and position in the empire of Persia—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last tale)

Prince Perviz's String of Pearls. When prince Perviz went on his exploits, he gave his sister Parzādê a string of pearls, saying, "So long as these pearls move readily on the string, you will know that I am alive and well, but if they stick fast and will not move, it will signify that I am dead"—Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last tale)

* * * Birtha's emerald ring, and prince Bahman's knife gave similar warnings (See BIRTHA and BAHMAN)

Pescecola, the famous swimmer drowned in the pool of Charybdis. The tale tells us how Pescecola dived once into the pool and came up safe, but King Frederick then threw into the pool a golden cup, which Pescecola dived for, and was never seen again—Schuller, The Diver (1781)

Pest (Mr), a barrister—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.)

Pet, a fair girl with rich brown hair hanging free in natural ringlets. A lovely girl, with a free, frank face, and most wonderful eyes—so large, so soft, so bright, and set to perfection in her kind, good face. She was round, and fresh, and dimpled, and spoilt, most charmingly timid, most bewitchingly self-willed. She was the daughter of Mr Meagles, and married Henry Gowan—C. Dickens, Little Dorrit (1857)

Pétaud (King), king of the beggars

It is an old saying" replied the abbé Huet. Pétaud being derived from the Latin peto I beg—"Asylum Christi" II.

The court of king Pétaud, a disorderly assembly, a place of utter confusion, a bear-garden

On n'y respecte rien. chacun y parle haut.
Et c'est tout justement la cour du roi Pétaud.
Molière Tartuffe I. I (1664).

La cour du roi Pétaud où chacun est maître—French Proverb

Petella, the waiting-woman of Rosalinda and Lillia-Bianca, the two daughters of Nantoleto—Beaumont and Fletcher The Wild-goose Chase (1652)

Peter, the stupid son of Solomon butler of the count Wintersen. He grotesquely parrots in an abridged form whatever his father says. Thus Sol "We are acquainted with the reverence due to exalted personages." Pet "Yes, we are acquainted with exalted personages." Again Sol, "Extremely sorry it is not in my power to entertain your lordship " Pet "Extremely sorry " Sol "Your lordship's most obedient, humble, and devoted servant " Pet "Devoted servant"—Benjamin Thompson, The Stranger (1797)

Peter, the pseudonym of John Gibson Lockhart, in a work entitled Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk (1819)

Peter (Lord), the pope of Rome—Dean Swift, Tale of a Tub (1701)

Peter Botte, a steep, almost perpendicular "mountain" in the Mauritius, more than 2800 feet in height. It is so called from Peter Botte, a Dutch sailor, who scaled it and fixed a flag on its summit, but lost his life in coming down

Peter Parley, the nom de plume of Samuel G. Goodrich, an American, whose books for children had an enormous circulation in the middle of the nineteenth century (1793-1860)

The name was pirated by numerous persons—Darton and Co., Simkins, Bogue, Legg, Hodson, Clements, etc., brought out books under the name, but not written by S. G. Goodrich

Peter Peobles, a litigious, hard-hearted drunkard, noted for his lawsuit—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.)

Peter Pindar, the pseudonym of Dr. John Woleot, of Dodbrooke, Devonshire (1788-1819)

Peter Plymley's Letters, attributed to the Rev. Sydney Smith (1769-1845)

Peter Porcupine, William Cobbett, when he was a Tory. He brought out Peter Porcupine's Gazette, The Porcupine Papers, etc. (1762-1835)

Peter Wilkins, the hero of a tale of adventures, by Robert Pullock, of Clifford's Inn. His "flying women" (glawreys) suggested to Southey the "glendoveer" in The Curse of Kehama

Peter of Provence and the Fair Magalo'na, the chief characters of a French romance so called. Peter comes into possession of Merlin's wooden horse

Peter the Great of Egypt, Mehmet Ali (1768-1818).

Peter the Hermit, a gentleman of Amiens, who renounced the military life for the religious. He preached up the first crusade, and put himself at the head of 100,000 men, all of whom, except a few stragglers, perished at Nicea

He is introduced by Tasso in Jerusalem Delivered (1575), and by Sir W. Scott in Count Robert of Paris, a novel laid in the time of Rufus. A statue was erected to him at Amiens in 1851

Peter the Wild Boy, a savage discovered in November, 1725, in the forest of Hertswood, Hanover. He walked on all fours, climbed trees like a monkey, ate grass and other herbage. Efforts were made to reclaim him, but without success. He died February, 1785

Peter's Gate (St), the gate of purgatory, guarded by an angel stationed there by St. Peter. Virgil conducted Dante through hell and purgatory, and Beatrice was his guide through the planetary spheres. Dante says to the Mantuan bard

Lead me
That I St. Peter's gate may show
Onward he (I hope) moved, I close his steps pursued.
Dante Hell, l. (1300).

Peterborough, in Northamptonshire, so called from Penda (son of Pendar king of Mercia), who founded here a monastery in the seventh century. In 1541 the monastery (then a nunnery) was converted by Henry VIII into a cathedral and bishop's see. Before Penda's time, Peterborough was a village called Medhainstede—See Drayton, Polyolbion, xxi (1622)

Peterloo (The Field of), an attack of the military on a reform meeting held in St. Peter's Field, at Manchester, August 16, 1819

Peterson, a Swede, who deserts from Gustavus Vasa to Christian II king of Denmark—H. Brooke, Gustavus Vasa (1780)

Petit Andie executioner—Sir W. Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.)

Petit Perroquet, a king's gardener, with whom the king's daughter fell in love. It so happened that a prince was courting the lady, and, being jealous of Petit Perroquet, said to the king that the young man boasted he could bring hither Tartaro's horse. Now Tartaro was a huge giant and a cannibal. Petit Perroquet, however, made himself master of the horse. The prince next told the king that the young gardener boasted he could get possession of the giant's diamond. Thus he also contrived to make himself master of. The prince then told the king that the young man boasted he could bring hither the giant himself, and the way he accomplished the feat was to cover himself first with honey, and then with feathers and horns. Thus disguised, he told the giant to get into the coach he was driving, and he drove him to the king's court, and then married the princess—Rev W Webster, Basque Legends (1877)

Peto, lieutenant of "captain" sir John Falstaff's regiment. Pistol was his ensign or ancient, and Bardolph his corporal—Shakespeare, 1 and 2 Henry IV (1597-8)

Petowker (Miss Henrietta), of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane. She marries Mr Lillyvick, the collector of water-rates, but elopes with an officer—C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Petrarch (The English). Sir Philip Sidney (1554-1586) is so called by sir Walter Raleigh

Petrarch and Laura. Laura was a lady of Avignon, the wife of Hugues de Sade, née Laura de Noves, the mistress of the poet Petrarch. (See LAURA AND PETRARCH)

Petrarch of Spain, Garcilaso de la Vega, born at Toledo (1530-1568, or according to others, 1503-1536)

Petrified City (The), Ishmonie, in Upper Egypt. So called from the number of statues seen there, and traditionally said to be men, women, children, and dumb animals turned into stone—Kircher, Mundus Subterraneus (1664)

Petronius (C or T), a kind of Roman "beau Brummell" in the court of Nero. He was a great voluptuary and profligate, whom Nero appointed Arbiter Elegantie, and considered nothing comme il faut till it had received the sanction of this dictator-in-chief of the imperial pleasures. Tigellinus accused him of treason, and Petronius committed suicide by opening his veins (A D 66)

Behold the new Petronius of the day

The arbiter of pleasure and of play

Byron English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809)

Petruccio = Pe truch'eo, governor of Bologna—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Chances (1620)

Petruchio, a gentleman of Verona, who undertakes to tame the haughty

Katharina, called "the Shrew." He marries her, and without the least personal chastisement reduces her to lamb-like submission. Being a fine compound of bodily and mental vigour, with plenty of wit, spirit, and good-nature, he rules his subordinates dictatorially, and shows he will have his own way, whatever the consequences—Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew (1594)

C Leslie says Henry Woodward (1717-1777) was the best "Petruchio," "Copper Captain," "captain Flash," and "Bobadil"

Beaumont and Fletcher wrote a comedy, called The Tamer Tamed, in which Petruchio is supposed to marry a second wife, by whom he is hen-pecked (1647)

Petticoat Lane, Whitechapel, was previously called "Hog Lane," and is now called "Middlesex Street"

Petty Cury, in Cambridge, is not petit curier, but "parva coheria," petit curary, from curare, "to cook or cure meat"

Petulant, an "odd sort of small wit," "without manners or breeding." In controversy he would bluntly contradict, and he never spoke the truth. When in his "club," in order to be thought a man of intrigue, he would steal out quietly, and then in disguise return and call for himself, or leave a letter for himself. He not unfrequently mistook impudence and malice for wit, and looked upon a modest blush in woman as a mark of "guilt or ill-breeding"—W Congreve, The Way of the World (1700)

Peu-à-Peu. So George IV called prince Leopold Stein, speaking of the prince's vacillating conduct in reference to the throne of Greece, says of him, "He has no colour," i.e. no fixed plan of his own, but is blown about by every wind

Peveril (William), natural son of William the Conqueror, and ancestor of Peveril of the Peak

Sir Geoffrey Peveril, a cavalier, called "Peveril of the Peak"

Lady Margaret Peveril, wife of sir Geoffrey

Juhan Peveril, son of sir Geoffrey, in love with Alice Bridgenorth. He was named by the author after Juhan Young, son of the famous actor—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Whom is he called after? said Scott. It is a fancy name," said Young. In memoriam of his mother Julia Ann" "Well, it is a capital name for a novel. I must say," he replied. "In the very next novel by the author of Waccerley, the hero's name is Julian." I allude, of course, to Peveril of the Peak.—Young Memoirs 91

Peveril of the Peak, the longest of all sir W. Scott's novels, and the most heavy (1823)

Phædra, daughter of Minos, and wife of Theseus (See PHEDRA)

Phædra, waiting-woman of Alcmena (wife of Amphitryon). A type of venality of the lowest and grossest kind. Phædra is betrothed to judge Gripus, a stupid magistrate, ready to sell justice to the highest bidder. Neither Phædra nor Gripus forms any part of the dramatis personæ of Molière's Amphitryon (1668).—Dryden, Amphitryon (1690)

Phædræa, the impersonation of wantonness. She is handmaid of the enchantress Acrasia, and sails about Idle Lake in a gondola. Seeing sir Guyon, she ferries him across the lake to the floating island, where he is set upon by Cymochles. Phædræa interposes, and ferries sir Guyon (the Knight Temptance) over the lake again.—Spenser, Fæery Queen, II (1590)

Pha'eton (3 syl), son of Helios and Clymène. He obtained leave to drive his father's sun-car for one day, but was overthrown, and nearly set the world on fire. Jove or Zeus (1 syl) struck him with a thunderbolt for his presumption, and cast him into the river Po.

Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, in Sicily. When Perillos, the brass-founder of Athens, brought to him a brazen bull, and told the tyrant it was intended for the punishment of criminals, Phalaris inquired into its merits. Perillos said the victim was to be enclosed in the bull, and roasted alive, by making the figure red hot. Certain tubes were so constructed as to make the groans of the victim resemble the bellows of a mad bull. The tyrant much commended the ingenuity, and ordered the invention to be tried on Perillos himself.

Letters of Phalaris, certain apocryphal letters ascribed to Phalaris the tyrant, and published at Oxford, in 1718, by Charles Boyle. There was an edition in 1777 by Walekenaer, another in 1823 by G. H. Schäfer, with notes by Boyle and others. Bentley maintained that the letters were forgeries, and no doubt Bentley was right.

Phallas, the horse of Heracles (Greek, phalios, "a grey horse")

Phantom Ship (The), Carlin than or Carmilhan, the phantom ship on which the hobold of the Cape sits, when he appears to doomed vessels that phantom ship, whose form

Shoots like a meteor thro' the storm,
And well the doomed spectators know
Tis harbringer of wreck and woe.

Sir W. Scott, Pooleby II. 11 (1812)

Pha'on, a young man who loved Claribel, but, being told that she was unfaithful to him, watched her. He saw, as he thought, Claribel holding an assignation with some one he supposed to be a groom. Returning home, he encountered Claribel herself, and "with wrathfull hand he slew her innocent." On the trial for murder, "the lady" was proved to be Claribel's servant. Phaon would have slain her also, but while he was in pursuit of her he was attacked by Furor.—Spenser, Fæery Queen, II. 4, 28, etc (1590)

* * * Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing is a similar story. Both are taken from a novel by Belleforest, copied from one by Bandello. Ariosto, in his Orlando Furioso, has introduced a similar story (bk. 1), and Turbervill's Gencura is the same tale.

Pharamond, king of the Franks, who visited, incognito, the court of king Arthur, to obtain by his exploits a place among the knights of the Round Table. He was the son of Marcomir, and father of Clodion.

Calprenède has an heroic romance so called, which (like his Cleopatra and Cassandra) is a Roman de Longue Haleine (1612-1666)

Phar'amond, prince of Spain, in the drama called Phylaster or Love Lies a-bleeding, by Beaumont and Fletcher (date uncertain, probably about 1662)

Pharaoh, the titular name of all the Egyptian kings till the time of Solomon, as the Roman emperors took the titular name of Cesar. After Solomon's time, the titular name Pharaoh never occurs alone, but only as a forename, as Pharaoh Necho, Pharaoh Hophni, Pharaoh Shishak. After the division of Alexander's kingdom, the kings of Egypt were all called Ptolemy, generally with some distinctive aftername, as Ptolemy Philadelphos, Ptolemy Euergetes, Ptolemy Philopator, etc.—Selden, Titles of Honour, v. 50 (1614).

Pharaohs before Solomon (mentioned in the Old Testament)

1 Pharaoh contemporary with Abraham (Gen xii 15) I think this was Osirtesen I (dynasty xii)

2 The good Pharaoh who advanced Joseph (Gen xli) I think this was Apōphus (one of the Hysos)

3 The Pharaoh who "knew not Joseph" (Exod i 8) I think this was Amenophis I (dynasty xviii) The king at the flight of Moses, I think, was Thothmes II

4 The Pharaoh drowned in the Red Sea As this was at least eighty years after the persecutions began, probably this was another king Some say it was Menephtes son of Ram'ses II, but it seems quite impossible to reconcile the account in Exodus with any extant historical account of Egypt (Exod xiv 28) (?) Was it Thothmes III?

5 The Pharaoh who protected Hadad (1 Kings xi 19)

6 The Pharaoh whose daughter Solomon married (1 Kings iii 1, ix 16) I think this was Puseennes I (dynasty xxi)

Pharaohs after Solomon's time (mentioned in the Old Testament)

1 Pharaoh Shishak, who warred against Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv 25, 26, 2 Chron vi 2)

2 The Pharaoh called "So" king of Egypt, with whom Hoshea made an alliance (2 Kings xviii 4)

3 The Pharaoh who made a league with Hezekiah against Sennacherib He is called Tirhakah (2 Kings xix 21, xix 9)

4 Pharaoh Necho, who warred against Josiah (2 Kings xxiii 29, etc)

5 Pharaoh Hophra, the ally of Zedekiah Said to be Pharaoh Apries, who was strangled, B.C. 569-525 (Jer xli 80)

* * Bunsen's solution of the Egyptian dynasties cannot possibly be correct

Pharaohs noted in romance

1 Cheops or Suphis I, who built the great pyramid (dynasty iv)

2 Cephrenēs or Suphis II his brother, who built the second pyramid

3 Mencherēs, his successor, who built the most beautiful, though not the largest, of the pyramids

4 Memnon or A-menophis III, whose musical statue is so celebrated (dynasty xiii)

5 Sethos I the Great, whose tomb was discovered by Belzoni (dynasty xv)

6 Sethos II, called "Proteus," who detained Helen and Paris in Egypt (dynasty xix)

Pharaoh's Daughter The daughter of Pharaoh who brought up Moses was Bathia

Bathia, the daughter of Pharaoh came attended by her maidens and entering the water she chanced to see the box of bulrushes and pitying the infant, she rescued him from death.—The Talmud vi

Pharaoh's Wife, Asia daughter of Mozāhem Her husband cruelly tormented her because she believed in Moses He fastened her hands and feet to four stakes, and laid a millstone on her as she lay in the hot sun with her face upwards, but angels shaded off the sun with their wings, and God took her, without dying, into paradise—Sale, Al Korān, lvi note

Among women four have been perfect Asia wife of Pharaoh Mary daughter of Imrān Kindjāli daughter of Khawālid Mahomet's first wife and Fātima, Mahomet's daughter—Attributed to Mahomet.

* * There is considerable doubt respecting the Pharaoh meant—whether the Pharaoh whose daughter adopted Moses, or the Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea The tale suits the latter king far better than it does the first

Pharian Fields, Egypt, so called from Pharos, an island on the Egyptian coast, noted for its lighthouse

And passed from Pharian fields to Canaan land.
Milton Paradise Lost (1633)

Pharsalia (The), a Latin epic in ten books, by Lucan, the subject being the fall and death of Pompey It opens with the passage of Cæsar across the Rubicon This river formed the boundary of his province, and his crossing it was virtually a declaration of war (bk. i) Pompey is appointed by the senate general of the army to oppose him (bk. v), Cæsar retreats to Thessaly, Pompey follows (bk. vi), and both prepare for war Pompey, being routed in the battle of Pharsalia, flees (bk. vii), and seeking protection in Egypt, is met by Achillas the Egyptian general, who murders him, cuts off his head, and casts his body into the sea (bk. viii) Cato leads the residue of Pompey's army to Cyrenē, in Africa (bk. ix), and Cæsar, in pursuit of Pompey, landing at Alexandria, is hospitably entertained by Cleopatra (bk x) While here, he tarries in luxuriant dalliance, the palace is besieged by Egyptians, and Cæsar with difficulty escapes to Pharos. He is closely pursued, hemmed in on all sides, and leaps into the sea. With his imperial robe held between his teeth, his commentaries in his left hand, and his sword in his right, he buffets with the waves. A thousand javelins are hurled at him, but touch him not. He swims for empire, he swims for life, 'tis Cæsar and his fortunes that the waves bear on. He reaches his fleet, is received by his soldiers with thundering applause. The stars in their courses fought for Cæsar. The sea-gods were with him, and Egypt with her host was a by-word and a scorn.

* * Bt it contains the account of the African serpents, by far the most celebrated passage of the whole poem. The following is a pretty close translation of the serpents themselves. It would occupy too much room to give their onslaught also —

Here the serpent d'adly brood appear
First the dall Asp's swelling neck uprear
The huge Hemorrhoid's rampire of the blood
Churns down that pollute both field and food
The Water-serpent, tyrant of the lake
The blooded Cobra, and the Platan snake
Here with d'extended jaws the Free-crays strays
And Seps, whose bile both flesh and bone decays
The Amphibians with its double head,
One on the neck, and one of tall forest
The horned Cornut, and the Hamon slake Whose stumpy bus might balk the keenest sight
A feverish thirst betrays the Dipens sting
The Scytala, its elough that casts in spring
The Vatrix here the crystal stream pollutes
Swift thro' the air the venomous Javelin shoots
Here the Pariax, moring on its tail,
Marks in the sand its progress by its trail
The speckled Cenchris darts its d'evous way
Its skin with spots as Theban marble gay
The hissing A-bila, and Ba-Blik,
With whom no living thing's life would risk,
Where'er it moves none else would dare remain
Tyrant alike and terror of the plain.

E. C. B.

In this battle Pompey had 45,000 legionaries, 7000 horse, and a large number of auxiliaries. Cæsar had 22,000 legionaries, and 1000 horse. Pompey's battle cry was Hercules inictus! That of Cæsar was Venus victrix! Cæsar won the battle.

Pheasant. So called from Phasis, a stream of the Black Sea.

There was formerly at the fort of Poti a preserve of pheasants, which birds derive their European name from the river Phasis (the present Ilon) — Lieut.-General Mont.

Phebe (2 syl), a shepherdess beloved by the shepherd Silvius. While Rosalind was in boy's clothes, Phebe fell in love with the stranger, and made a proposal of marriage, but when Rosalind appeared in her true character, and gave her hand to Orlando, Phebe was content to accept her old love Silvius — Shakespeare, As You Like It (1600)

Phedre (or PHÆDRA), daughter of Minos king of Crete, and wife of Theseus. She conceived a criminal love for Hippolytus her step-son, and, being repulsed by him, accused him to her husband of attempting to dishonour her. Hippolytus was put to death, and Phædra, wrung with remorse, strangled herself.

This has been made the subject of tragedy by Euripides in Greek, Seneca in Latin, Racine in French (1677). "Phædre" was the great part of Mlle Rachel, she first appeared in this character in 1838.

(Pradon, under the patronage of the duchesse de Bouillon and the due de Nemours, produced, in 1677, his tragedy of Phædre in opposition to that of Racine. The duke even tried to hush down Racine's play, but the public judgment was more powerful than the duke, and while it pronounced decidedly for Racine's chef d'œuvre, it had no tolerance for Pradon's production.)

Phebe "the fair," the wife of Sir Guy earl of Warwick.

Phidias (The French), (1) Jean Goujon, also called "The Corrégio of Sculptors." He was slain in the St Bartholomew Massacre (1510-1572). (2) J. B. Pigalle (1714-1785).

Phil (Little), the lad of John Davies the old fisherman — Sir W. Scott, Pedgummet (time, George III.)

Philaminte (3 syl), wife of Chrysale the bourgeois, and mother of Armande, Henriette, Ariste, and Bélise — Moliere, Les Femmes Savantes (1672).

Philander, of Holland, was a guest at the house of Arge'o baron of Servia, and the baron's wife Gabr'na fell in love with him. Philander fled the house, and Gabr'na told her husband he had abused her, and had fled out of fear of him. He was pursued, overtaken, and cast into a dungeon. One day, Gabr'na visited him there, and asked him to defend her against a wicked knight. This he undertook to do, and Gabr'na posted him in a place where he could make his attack. Philander slew the knight, but discovered that it was Argeo. Gabr'na now declared she would give him up to justice, unless he married her, and Philander, to save his life, did so. But in a very short time the infamous woman tired of her toy, and cut him off by poison — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Phulan'der, a male coquet, so called from Philander the Dutch knight, mentioned above, who coquetted with Gaius. To "philander" is to wanton or make licentious love to a woman, to toy

Yes I'll baste you together you and your Philander — W. Congreve The Way of the World (1700)

Phila'rio, an Italian improvisatore, who remained faithful to Fazio even in disgrace — Dean Milman, Fazio (1815)

Philaster (Prince), heir to the crown of Messina Euphrasia, who was in love with Philaster, disguised herself as a boy, and assuming for the nonce the name of Bellario, entered the prince's service. Philaster, who was in love with the princess Arethusa, transferred Bellario to her service, and then grew jealous of Arethusa's love for the young page — Beaumont and Fletcher, Philaster or Love Lies a-bleeding (?) (1622)

There is considerable resemblance between Euphrasia and "Viola" in Twelfth Night (Shakespeare, 1614)

Philax, cousin of the princess Imis. The fay Pagan shut them up in the "Palace of Revenge," a superb crystal palace, containing every delight except the power of leaving it. In the course or a few years, Imis and Philax longed as much for a separation as at one time they had wished for a union — Comtesse D'Annoy, Fairy Tales ("Palace of Revenge," 1682)

Phile'mon (3 syl), an aged rustic, who, with his wife Baucis, hospitably received Jupiter and Mercury, after every one else had refused to receive them. The gods sent an inundation to destroy the inhospitable people, but saved Baucis and Philemon, and converted their cottage into a magnificent temple. At their own request, the aged couple died on the same day, and were changed into two trees, which stood before the temple — Greek Mythology

Philinte (2 syl), friend of Aleceste (2 syl) — Molière, Le Misanthrope (1666),

Philip, father of Wilham Swidger. His favourite expression was, "Lord, keep my memory green I am 87" — C. Dickens, The Haunted Man (1848)

Philip, the butler of Mr Peregrine Lovel, a hypocritical, rascally servant, who pretends to be most careful of his master's property, but who in reality wastes it most recklessly, and enriches himself with it most unblushingly. Being found out, he is summarily dismissed — Rev J Townley, High Life Below Stairs (1759)

Philip (Father), prior of St Mary's — Sir W Scott, The Monastery (time, Elizabeth)

Philip Augustus, king of France, introduced by sir W Scott in The Talisman (time, Richard I)

Philip Nye, brought up for the Anglian Church, but became a presbyterian, and afterwards an independent. He was noted for the cut of his beard

This reverend brother like a goat,
Did wear a tail upon his throat;
But set in such a curious frame,
As if 'twere wrought in slograth,
And cut so even as if 'twere been Drawn with a pen upon his chin.

S. Butler on Philip Nye's Thanksgiving beard (165.)

Philip Quarl, a castaway sailor, who becomes a hermit. His "man Friday" is a chimpanzee — Philip Quarl (1727)

Philip's Four Daughters. We are told, in Acts xxi 9, that Philip the deacon or evangelist had four daughters which did prophesy

Helen the mother of great Constantine
Nor yet St. Philip's daughters, were like thee (Joan of Arc)

Shakespeare 1 Henry VI act I sc. 2 (1529)

Philippe, a parched and haggard wretch, inbred and bent beneath a pile of years, yet shrewd and cunning, greedy of gold, malicious, and looked on by the common people as an imp of darkness. It was this old villain who told Thanemar that the provost of Bruges was the son of a serf on Thanemar's estates — S Knowles, The Provost of Bruges (1836)

Philpot (senior), an avaricious old hunk, and father of George Philpot. The old City merchant cannot speak a sentence without bringing in something about money. "He wears square-toed shoes with little tiny buckles, a brown coat with small brass buttons. His face is all shrivelled and pinched with care, and he shakes his head like a mandarin upon a chimney-piece" (act I 1)

When I was very young I performed the part of "Old Philpot, at Brighton, with great success, and next evening I was introduced into a club-room full of company. On hearing my name announced, one of the gentlemen laid down his pipe and taking up his glass said: "Here's to your health young gentleman and to your father's too. I had the pleasure of seeing him last night in the part of 'Philpot, and a very nice clever old gentleman he is. I hope young sir you may one day be as good an actor as your worthy father"—Mauden.

George Philpot. The profligate son of old Philpot, destined for Maria Wilding, but the betrothal is broken off, and Maria marries Beaufort. George wants to pass for a dashing young blade, but is made the dupe of every one. "Bubbled at play, duped by a girl to whom he paid his addresses, cudgelled by a rake, laughed at by his cronies, snubbed by his father, and despised by every one"—Murphy, The Citizen (1757 or 1761)

Philtrā, a lady of large fortune, betrothed to Bracidas, but, seeing the fortune of Amidas daily increasing, and that of Bracidas getting smaller and smaller, she forsook the declining fortune of her first lover, and attached herself to the more prosperous younger brother—Spenser, Faery Queen, v 4 (1596)

Phineus [Ph'neus], a blind sooth-sayer, who was tormented by the harpies. Whenever a meal was set before him, the harpies came and carried it off, but the Argonauts delivered him from these pests in return for his information respecting the route they were to take in order to obtain the golden fleece (See TIRK-SIAS)

Phoc'as, general of the Syrian army in the siege of Damascus. Phoc'as was in love with Ludo'cia, daughter of Lumen's the governor, but when he asked the governor's consent, Lumen's sternly refused to give it. After gaining several battles, Phoc'as fell into the hands of the Arabs, and consented to join their army to revenge himself on Lumen's. The Arabs triumphed, and Ludo'cia was taken captive, but she refused to wed a traitor. Ultimately, Phoc'as died, and Ludo'cia entered a convent.—John Hughes, Story of Damascus (1729)

Phœbus, the sun-god Phœbe (2nd), the moon-goddess—Greek Mythology

Phœbe's Sun Phœtion obtained permission of his father to drive the "sun-car" for one day, but, unable to guide the horses, they left their usual track, the car was overturned, and both heaven and earth were threatened with destruction. Jupiter smote Phœtion with his thunder-bolt, and he fell headlong into the Po.

The Phœbe's fiery chariot
That all presume is father's fiery wayne.

And wrap with whirling wheels, inflames the sky
With fire not made to burn, but fairly for to burn.
Spenser, Fairy Queen L. 4. 10 (1599)

Shake out The Tempest act III. sc. 2 (1677)

Phœbus, "the old man of the sea." He had three daughters, with only one eye and one tooth between em.—Greek Mythology

This is not "the old man of the sea" mentioned in the Arabian Nights ("Sindbad the Sailor")

Phœ'mio, a parasite, who is "all thanks to all men"—Terence, Phœ'mio

Phosphor, the light-bringer or morning star, also called Hesperus, and by Homer and Hesiod Hesper-phōros

Bright Phosphor brother for the night
Sweet Hesper Hesperus double name
Tennyson In Memoriam, text. (1830)

Phos'phorus, a knight called by Tennyson "Morning Star," but, in the History of Prince Arthur, "sir Persvaunt of India or the Blue Knight." One of the four brothers who kept the passages to Castle Perilous—Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lyndette"), sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i. 131 (1470)

It is evidently a blunder to call the Blue Knight "Morning Star" and the Green Knight "Evening Star." In the old romance, the combat with the "Green Knight" is at dawn, and with the "Blue Knight" at nightfall. The error arose from not bearing in mind that our forefathers began the day with the preceding eve, and ended it at sunset.

Phraortes (3 syl), a Greek admiral—Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus).

Phrat, the Eu-phrat-es, now called Iorat or Irat.

Phry'ne (2 syl'), an Athenian courtezan of surpassing beauty. Apellês's celebrated picture of "Venus Anadyomenê" was drawn from Phrynê, who entered the sea with hair dishevelled for a model. The "Cnidian Venus" of Praxitlês was also taken from the same model.

Some say Campispê was the academy
Pope has a poem called Phryne.

Phyllis, a Thracian who fell in love with Demoph'oon. After some months of mutual affection, Demophoon was obliged to sail for Athens, but promised to return within a month. When a month had elapsed, and Demophoon did not put in an appearance, Phyllis so mourned for him that she was changed into an almond tree, hence called by the Greeks Phylla. In time, Demophoon returned, and, being told the fate of Phyllis, ran to embrace the tree, which, though bare and leafless at the time, was instantly covered with leaves, hence called Phylla
by the Greeks.

Let Demophoon tell
Why Phyllis by a fate untimely fell.
Orid. Art of Love III.

Phyllis, a country girl in Virgil's third and fifth Lelagues. Hence, a rustic maiden. Also spelt Phyllis (q v).

Phyllis, in Spenser's eclogue Colin Clout's Come Home Again, is lady Carey, wife of sir George Carey (afterwards lord Hunsdon, 1596). Lady Carey was Elizabeth, the second of the six daughters of sir John Spenser of Althorpe, ancestor of the noble houses of Spenser and Marlborough.

No less praiseworthy are the sisters three,
The honour of the noble family
Of which I meanest boast myself to be Phyllis, Chryllis, and sweet Amaryllis
Phyllis the fair is eldest of the three.
Spenser Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1594)

Phyllis and Brunetta, rival beauties. Phyllis procured for a certain festival some marvellous fabric of gold brocade in order to eclipse her rival, but Brunetta dressed the slave who bore her train in a robe of the same material and cut in precisely the same fashion, while she herself wore simple black. Phyllis died of mortification — The Spectator (1711, 1712, 1714).

Phynnodderee, a Manx spirit, similar to the Scotch brownie. Phynodderee is an outlawed fairy, who absented himself from Fairy-court on the great leise day of the harvest moon.

Instead of paying his respects to king
Oberon, he remained in the glen of Rushen, dancing with a pretty Manx maid whom he was courting.

Physic a Farce is (His) Sir John Hill began his career as an apothecary in St Martin's Lane, London, became author, and amongst other things wrote farces. Garriek said of him

For physic and farces, his equal there scarce is His farces are physic, his physic a farce is.

of roguery, called in Spanish *Gusto
Picaresco*. Gil Blas is one of this school of novels.

Pic'atrix, the pseudonym of a Spanish monk, author of a book on demono-logy.

When I was a student, that same Rev Picatrix was wont to tell us that devils did naturally fear the bright flashes of swords much as he feared the splendour of the sun. — Rabelais, Pantagruel, III 23 (1542).

Piccolino, an opera by Mons
Guiraud (1875), libretto by MM Sardou and Nittier. This opera was first introduced to an English audience in 1779. The tale is thus: Marthe, an orphan girl adopted by a Swiss pastor, is in love with Frédéric Auvray, a young artist, who "loved and left his love." Marthe plods through the snow from Switzerland to Rome to find her young artist, but, for greater security, puts on boy's clothes, and assumes the name of Piccolino. She sees Frédéric, who knows her not, but, struck with her beauty, makes a drawing of her. Marthe discovers that the faithless Frédéric is paying his addresses to Elena (sister of the duke Strozzi). She tells the lady her love-tale, and Frédéric, deserted by Elena, forbids Piccolino (Marthe) to come into his presence again. The poor Swiss wanderer throws herself into the Tiber, but is rescued. Frédéric repents, and the curtain falls on a reconciliation and approaching marriage.

Pickel-Herringe (5 syl), a popular name among the Dutch for a buffoon, a corruption of peel-harin ("a hairy sprite"), answering to Ben Jonson's Puck-hairy.

Pickle (Peregrino), a savage, ungrateful spendthrift, fond of practical jokes, delighting in tormenting others, but suffering with ill temper the misfortunes which resulted from his own wilfulness. His ingratitude to his uncle, and his arrogance to Hatchway and Pipes, are simply hateful.—T. Smollett, The Adventures of Peregrine Pickle (1751).

Pickwick (Samuel), the chief character of The Pickwick Papers, a novel by C. Dickens. He is general chairman of the Pickwick Club. A most verdant, benevolent, elderly gentleman, who, as member of a club instituted "for the purpose of investigating the source of the Hampstead ponds," travels about with three members of the club, to whom he acts as guardian and adviser. The adventures they encounter form the subject of the Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club (1836).

The original of Seymour's picture of "Pickwick" was a Mr. John Foster (not the biographer of Dickens, but a friend of Mr. Chapman's the publisher). He lived at Richmond, and was "a fat old beau," noted for his "drab tights and black gaiters."

Pickwickian Sense (In a), an insult whitewashed. Mr. Pickwick accused Mr. Blotton of acting in "a vile and calumnious manner," whereupon Mr. Blotton retorted by calling Mr. Pickwick "a humbug." But it finally was made to appear that both had used the offensive words only in a parliamentary sense, and that each entertained for the other "the highest regard and esteem." So the difficulty was easily adjusted, and both were satisfied.

Lawyers and politicians daily abuse each other in a Pickwickian sense.—Bowditch.

Picrochole, king of Lernæ, noted for his choleric temper, his thirst for empire, and his vast but ill-digested projects.—Rabelais, Gargantua, i (1533).

Supposed to be a satire on Charles V of Spain.

The rulers of Utopia one day asked the cake-bakers of Lernæ to sell them some cakes. A quarrel ensued, and king Picrochole marched with all his army against Utopia, to extirpate the insolent inhabitants.—I. k. l. 33.

Picrochole's Counsellors. The duke of Smaltrash, the earl of Swashbuckler, and captain Durtaille, advised king Picrochole to leave a small garrison at home, and to divide his army into two parts—to send one south, and the other north. The former was to take Portugal, Spain, Italy, Germany (but was to spare the life of Barbarossa), to take the islands of the Mediterranean, the Morea, the Holy Land, and all Lesser Asia. The northern army was to take Belgium, Denmark, Prussia, Poland, Russia, Norway, Sweden, sail across the Sandy Sea, and meet the other half at Constantinople, when king Picrochole was to divide the nations amongst his great captains. Lelephron said he had heard about a pitcher of milk which was to make its possessor a nabob, and give him for wife a sultan's daughter, only the poor fellow broke his pitcher, and had to go supperless to bed. (See BOWDITCH.)—Rabelais, Pantagruel, i. 33 (1533).

A shoemaker bought a haporth of milk, with this he intended to make butter. The butter was to buy a cow the cow was to have a calf the calf was to be sold and the man to become a nabob. Only the poor dreamer cracked the jug, spilt the milk, and had to go supperless to bed.—Pantagruel, l. 33.

Picts, the Caledonians or inhabitants of Albin, i. e. northern Scotland. The Scots came from Scotia, north of Ireland, and established themselves under Kenneth M'Alpin in 843.

The etymology of "Picts" from the Latin picti ("painted men"), is about equal to Stevens's etymology of the word "brethren" from tabernacle "because we breathe-therein."

Picture (The), a drama by Massinger (1629). The story of this play (like that of the Twelfth Night, by Shakespeare) is taken from the novella of Baudello of Piedmont, who died 1555.

Picus, a soothsayer and augur, husband of Canens. In his prophetic art he made use of a woodpecker (picus), a prophetic bird sacred to Mars. Circé fell in love with him, and as he did not requite her advances, she changed him into a woodpecker, whereby he still retained his prophetic power.

"There is Picus," said Virgil. What a strange thing is tradition! Perhaps it was in this very forest that Circé gathering her herbs saw the bold friend of Mars on his fiery courser and tried to bewitch him, and fall in love with him so. What a wonder ever first wedded that story to the woodpecker?—Ovid Artidne 1. 12.

Pied Horses Motassem had 130,000 pied horses, which he employed to carry earth to the plain of Catoul, and having raised a mound of sufficient height to command a view of the whole neighbourhood, he built thereon the royal city of Samarah!—Khondemir, Khelassat al Akhbar (1495).

The Hill of the Pied Horses, the site of the palace of Alkoremmi, built by Motassem, and enlarged by Vathek.

Pied Piper of Hamelin (3 syl), a piper named Bunting, from his dress. He undertook, for a certain sum of money, to free the town of Hamelin, in Brunswick, of the rats which infested it, but when he had drowned all the rats in the river Weser, the townsmen refused to pay the sum agreed upon. The piper, in revenge, collected together all the children of Hamelin, and enticed them by his piping into a cavern in the side of the mountain Koppenberg, which instantly closed upon them, and 130 went down alive into the pit (June 26, 1284). The street through which Bunting conducted his victims was Buagen, and from that day to this no music is ever allowed to be played in this particular street—Verstegan, Restitution of Decayed Intelligence (1634).

Robert Browning has a poem entitled The Pied Piper.

Enchius, in his Exodus Hamelensis, maintains the truth of this legend, but Martin Schoock, in his Fabula Hamelensis, contends that it is a mere myth.

"Don't forget to pay the piper" is still a household expression in common use.

* * The same tale is told of the fiddler of Brandenburg. The children were led to the Marienberg, which opened upon them and swallowed them up.

* * When Lorch was infested with ants, a hermit led the multitudinous insects by his pipe into a lake, where they perished. As the inhabitants refused to pay the stipulated price, he led their pigs to the same dance, and they, too, perished in the lake.

Next year, a charcoal-burner closed the same place of crickets, and when the price agreed upon was withheld, he led the sheep of the inhabitants into the lake.

The third year came a plague of rats, which an old man of the mountain piped away and destroyed. Being refused his reward, he piped the children of Lorch into the Tannenberg.

* * About 200 years ago, the people of Ispahan were tormented with rats, when a little dwarf named Giouf, not above two feet high, promised, on the payment of a certain sum of money, to free the city of all its vermin in an hour. The terms were agreed to, and Giouf, by labor and pipe, attracted every rat and mouse to follow him to the river Zenderon, where they were all drowned. Next day, the dwarf demanded the money, but the people gave him several bad coins, which they refused to change. Next day, they saw with horror an old black woman, fifty feet high, standing in the market-place with a whip in her hand. She was the genie Mergian Banou, the mother of the dwarf. For four days she straggled daily fifteen of the principal women, and on the fifth day led forty others to a magic tower, into which she drove them, and they were never after seen by mortal eye—T. S. Guenette, Chinese Tales ("History of Prince Kader-Bilah," 1723).

* * The syrens of classic story had, by their weird spirit-music, a similar irresistible influence.

pilgrims on their way to Compostella stopped at a hospice in La Calzada The daughter of the innkeeper solicited a young Frenchman to spend the night with her, but he refused, so she put in his vallet a silver cup, and when he was on of theft. As the property was found in his possession, the alcaydé ordered him to be hung His parents went on their way to Compostella, and returned after ment to find their son alive on the gibbet and uninjured They went instantly to tell the alcaydé, but the magistrate replied, "Woman, you are mad! I would just as soon believe these pullets, which I am about to eat, are alive, as that a man who has been gibbeted eight days is not dead" No sooner had he spoken than the two pullets actually rose up alive The alcaydé was frightened out of his wits, and was about to rush out of doors, when the heads and feathers of the birds came scampering in to complete the Piper (Paddy the), an Irish piper, supposed to have been eaten by a cow. Going along one night during the "troubles," he knocked his head against the body of a dead man dangling from a tree. The sight of the "illegant" boots was too great a temptation, and as they refused to come off without the legs, Paddy took them too, and sought shelter for the night in a cowshed. The moon rose, and Paddy, mistaking the moonlight for the dawn, started for the fair, having drawn on the boots and left the "legs" behind. At daybreak, some of the piper's friends went in search of him and found, to their horror, that the cow as they supposed, had devoured him with the exception of his legs—clothes, bags, and all. They were horror-struck, and of course the cow was condemned to be sold, but while driving her to the fair, they were attracted by the strums of a piper coming towards them. The cow startled, made a bolt, with a view, as it was supposed of making a meal on another piper. "Help, help!" they shouted, when Paddy himself ran to their aid. The mystery was soon explained over a drop of the "eratur," and the cow was taken home again.—S. Lover, Legends and Stories of Ireland (1834)

Piper of Hamelin (The Pied), Bunting, who first charmed the rats of Hamelin into the Weser, and then allured the children (to the number of 130) to Koppenberg Hill, which opened upon them. (See PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN.)

For the self-same reason, he stumbled and blundered about, muddled and marred every thing he touched, and being a Jack-of-all-trades was master of none.

There has been an accident because I am so handy. I went to the dairy at a bound came back at another and fell down in the open street where I left the milk. I tried to pick it up—no go. Being sent to murder Imogen the wife of Posthumus, he persuades her to escape to Milford Haven in boy's clothes, and sends a bloody napkin to Posthumus, to make him believe that she has been murdered. Ultimately, Imogen becomes reconciled to her husband. (See POSTHUMUS)—Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605)

Pisistratos of Athens, being asked by his wife to punish with death a young man who had dared to kiss their daughter, replied, "How shall we requite those who wish us evil, if we condemn to death those who love us?" This anecdote is referred to by Dante, in his Purgatory, and Valerius Maximus, Memorable Acts and Sayings, &c.

Pisistratos and His Two Sons. The history of Pisistratos and his two sons is repeated in that of Cosmo de Medici of Florence and his two grandsons. It would be difficult to find a more striking parallel, whether we regard the characters or the incidents of the two families.

Pisistratos was a great favourite of the Athenian populace, so was Cosmo de Medici with the populace of Florence. Pisistratos was banished, but, being recalled by the people, was raised to sovereign power in the republic of Athens, so Cosmo was banished, but, being recalled by the people, was raised to supreme power in the republic of Florence. Pisistratos was just and merciful, a great patron of literature and spent large sums of money in beautifying Athens with architecture, the same may be said of Cosmo de Medici. To Pisistratus we owe the poems of Homer in a connected form, and to Cosmo we owe the best literature of Europe, for he spent fortunes in the copying of valuable MSS. The two sons of Pisistratus were Hipparchus and Hippias, and the two grandsons of Cosmo were Giuliano and Lorenzo. Two of the most honoured citizens of Athens

Francesco Pazzi and the archbishop of Pisa conspired against the grandsons of Cosmo—Giuliano was assassinated, but Lorenzo escaped. In both cases it was the elder brother who fell, and the younger which escaped. Hippias quelled the tumult, and succeeded in placing himself at the head of Athens, so did Lorenzo in Florence.

Pistol, in The Merry Wives of Windsor and the two parts of Henry IV, is the ancient or ensign of captain sir John Falstaff. Peto is his lieutenant, and Bardolph his corporal. Peto being removed (probably killed), we find in Henry V, Pistol is lieutenant, Bardolph ancient, and Nym corporal. Pistol is also introduced as married to Mistress Nell Quickly, hostess of the tavern in Eastcheap. Both Pistol and his wife die before the play is over, so does sir John Falstaff, Bardolph and Nym are both hanged. Pistol is a model bully, wholly unprincipled, and utterly despicable, but he treated his wife kindly, and she was certainly fond of him.—Shakespeare

His [let it be] courage is boasting his learning ignorance his ability weakness, and his end beggary.—Dr. Lodge.

(His end was not "beggary," as host of the tavern in Eastcheap, he seems much more respectable, and better off than before. Theophilus Cibber (1703-1758) was the best actor of this part.)

Pistris, the sea-monster sent to devour Andromeda. It had a dragon's head and a fish's tail.—Aratus, Commentaries

Pithyrian [Pithyrian], a pagan of Antioch. He had one daughter, named Maranna, who was a Christian. A young dragon of most formidable character infested the city of Antioch, and demanded a virgin to be sent out daily for its meal. The Antiochians cast lots for the first victim, and the lot fell on Maranna, who was led forth in grand procession as the victim of the dragon. Pithyrian, in distraction, rushed into a Christian church, and fell before an image which attracted his attention, at the base of which was the real arm of a saint. The Christian handed the holy relic to Pithyrian, who kissed it, and then restored it to the sacristan, but the servant did not observe that a thumb was missing. Off ran Pithyrian with the thumb, and joined his daughter. On came the dragon, with tail erect, wings extended, and mouth wide open, when Pithyrian threw into the gaping jaws the "sacred thumb." Down fell the tail, the wings dropped, the jaws were locked, and up rose the dragon into the air to the height of three miles, when it blew up into a myriad pieces. So the lady was rescued, Antioch delivered, and the relic, minus a thumb, testifies the fact of this wonderful miracle.—Southey, The Young Dragon (Spanish legend)

The duke of Orleans, regent of France, bought it for £130,000, whence it is often called "The Regent." The French republic sold it to Freskon, a merchant of Berlin. Napoleon I bought it to ornament his sword. It now belongs to the king of Prussia. (See DIAMONDS.)

Before the battle, Alonzo the husband of Cora confided his wife and child to Rolla, the beloved friend of the inca. The Peruvians were on the point of being routed, when Rolla came to the rescue, and redeemed the day, but Alonzo was made a prisoner of war. Rolla, thinking Alonzo to be dead, proposed to Cora, but she declined his suit, and having heard that her husband had fallen into the hands of the Spaniards, she implored Rolla to set him free. Accordingly, he entered the prison where Alonzo was confined, and changed clothes with him, but Elvira liberated him on condition that

Byron Don Juan I. 103 (1819)

Pleasures of Hope, a poem in two parts, by Thomas Campbell (1799). It opens with a comparison between the beauty of scenery and the ideal enchantments of fancy in which hope is never absent, but can sustain the seaman on his watch, the soldier on his march, and Byron in his perilous adventures. The hope of a mother, the hope of a prisoner, the hope of the wanderer, the grand hope of the patriot, the hope of regenerating uncivilized nations, extending liberty, and ameliorating the condition of the poor. It speaks of the hope of love, and the hope of a future state, concluding with the episode of Conrad and Lillaore. Conrad was a felon, transported to New South Wales, but, though "a martyr to his crimes, was true to his daughter." Soon, he says, he shall return to the dust from which he was taken,

But not my child with life's precarious fire
The immortal ties of Nature shall expire
Then shall resist the triumph of decay
When time is over, and worlds have passed away
Cold be the dust that this perished heart may lie
But that which warmed it once shall never die—
That spark, unburied in its mortal frame
With living light eternal, and the same
Shall burn on joy's interminable years
Unveiled by darkness, unmingled by tears.

PL II

Pleasures of Imagination, a poem in three books, by Akenside (1744).

All the pleasures of imagination arise from the perception of greatness, wonderfulness, or beauty. The beauty of greatness—witness the pleasure of mountain scenery, of astronomy, of infinity. The pleasure of what is wonderful—witness the delight of novelty, of the revelations of science, of tales of fancy. The pleasure of beauty which is always connected with truth—the beauty of colour, shape, and so on, in natural objects, the beauty of mind and the moral faculties. All it contemplates accident if pleasures arising from contrivance and design, emotion and passion, such as sorrow, pity, terror, and indignation. All in Moral imagination the parent of vice, the benefits of a well-trained imagination.

(The first book is by far the best. Alen de recast his poem in maturer life, but no one thinks he improved by so doing. The first or original cast is the only one read, and parts of the first book are well known.)

Pleasures of Memory, a poem in two parts, by Samuel Rogers (1794). The first part is restricted to the pleasure of memory afforded by the five senses, as that arising from visiting celebrated places, and that afforded by pictures. It then goes into the pleasures of the mind, as imagination, and memory of past griefs and dangers. The poem concludes with the supposition that in the life to come this faculty will be greatly enlarged. The episode is thus Florio, a young sportsman accidentally met Julia in a grove, and followed her home, when her father, a rich squire, welcomed him as his guest, and tallied with delight of his younger days when hawk and hound were his joy of joys. Florio took Julia for a sail on the lake, but the vessel was capsize, and though Julia was saved from the water, she died on being brought to shore. It was Florio's delight to haunt the places which Julia frequented.

He charmed from the end of tears Men cry it new
A charm it is there the mind and sweetest love.
It is

Pleiads (The), a cluster of seven stars in the constellation Taurus, and applied to a cluster of seven celebrated contemporaries. The stars were the seven daughters of Atlas: Maia, Electra, Taygete (1 syl), Asteropë, Meropë, Alcyonë, and Celoë.

The Pleiad of Alexandria consisted of Callimachus, Apollonios Rhodios, Aristos, Homer the Younger, Lycophron, Nicander, and Theocritus. All of Alexandria, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphos.

The Pleiad of Charlemagne consisted of Alcuin, called "Albinus," Angilbert, called "Homer," Adelard, called "Augustine," Rhenfe, called "Demetrius," Varnesrid, Iginhard, and Charlemagne himself, who was called "David."

The Lost French Pleiad (sixteenth century) Ronsard, Joachim du Bellay, Antoine de Baif, René Belleau, Jodelhe, Pontus de Thivard and the seventh is either Dorot or Amadis de Jarnay. All under Henri III.

The Second French Pleiad (seventeenth century) Rapin, Commire, Lamoignon, Menage, Duprier, and Paillet.

The last also our English cluster. Three were then born in the second half of the sixteenth century Spenser (1571), Drayton (1568), Shakespeare and Marlowe (1564), Ben Jonson (1571), Fletcher (1576), Masson or (1580) Beaumont (Fletcher's colleague) and Ford (1580). Besides these, there were Tusser (1557), Raleigh (1570), Sir Philip Sidney (1557), Pliniers Fletcher (1551), Hader (1551), and several others.

Another cluster came a century later Prior (1661), Swift (1667), Addison and Cowley (1672), Rowe (1673), Dryden (1678), Young (1683), Gay and Pope (1688), MacKen (1690).

The cluster born in the latter half of the eighteenth century Sheridan (1751), Crabbe (1751), Burns (1759), Parnell (1763), Wordsworth (1770), Scott (1771), Coleridge (1772), Southey (1773), Campbell (1777), Moore (1779), Byron (1788), Shelley and Keble (1792), and Keats (1796).

Butler (1600), Milton (1608), and Dryden (1630) came between the first and second clusters. Thomson (1700), Gray (1717), Collins (1720), Alenside (1721), Goldsmith (1728), and Cowper (1731), between the second and the third.

Pleonec'tes (1 syl), Covetousness personified in The Purple Island, by Pliniers Fletcher (1633). "His gold his god." He "much fears to keep, much more to lose his lustre." Fully described in canto viii (Greek, pleonec'te, "covetous").

Pleydell (St. Paulus), an advocate in Edinburgh, shrewd and witty. He was at one time the sheriff at Edinburgh.

Mr. even Mr. Pleydell was a lively sharp-tongued gentleman with a professional shrewdness. In the end and generally speaking a professional formally to the manner but this he could alig off on a Saturday evening, when he joined in the ancient jollime of Ilk's Jinks—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering xix (dme, f. 107, 11)

Pliable, a neighbour of Christian, whom he accompanied as far as the "Slough of Despond," when he turned back—Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, 1 (1678)

Pliant (Sir Paul), a hen-pecked husband, who dares not even touch a letter addressed to himself till his lady has read it first. His perpetual oath is "Gidsbud!" He is such a dolt that he would not believe his own eyes and ears, if they bore testimony against his wife's fidelity and continency (See PLACID, p. 773)

Samuel Foote (1701-1777) attempted the part of sir ^{however the} Pliant ^{it was a full} Davies.

Jaily Pliant, second wife of sir Paul. "She's handsome, and knows it, is very silly, and thinks herself wise, has a choleric old husband" very fond of her, but whom she rules with spirit, and snubs "afore folk." My lady says, "If one has one's sworn, it is most unchristian, inhuman, and obscene that one should break it." Her conduct with Mr Careless is most reprehensible—Congreve, The Double Dealer (1694)

Those who remember the lady Pliant of Margaret Woffington (1718-1760), will recollect with pleasure her whimsical discovery of passion and her awkwardly assumed prudery.—T. Davies.

Pliny (The German) or "Modern Pliny," Konrad von Gesner of Zurich, who wrote Historia Animalium, etc (1516-1560)

Pliny of the East, Zakariya ibn Muhammad, surnamed "Kazwini," from Kazwin, the place of his birth. He is so called by De Sacy (1200-1283)

Plon-Plon, prince Napoleon Joseph Charles Bonaparte, son of Jerome Bonaparte by his second wife (the princess Frederica Catherine of Wurtemberg). Plon-plon is a euphonic corruption of Crant-Plomb ("fear-bullet"), a nickname given to the prince in the Crimean war (1854-6)

Plornish, plasterer, Bleeding-heart Yard. He was a smooth-cheeked, fresh-coloured, sandy-whiskered man of 30. Long in the legs, yielding at the knees, foolish in the face, flannel-jacketed and lime-whitened. He generally chimed in conversation by echoing the words or the person speaking. Thus if Mrs Plornish said to a visitor, "Miss Dorrit duran't let him know," he would chime in, "Dursn't let him know." "Me and Plornish says, 'Ho! Miss Dorrit,'" Plornish repeated after his wife, "Ho! Miss Dorrit." "Can you employ Miss Dorrit?" Plornish repeated as an echo, "Employ Miss Dorrit?" (See PETER, p. 751)

Mrs Plornish, the plasterer's wife. A young woman, somewhat slatternly in herself and her belongings, and dragged by care and poverty already into wrinkles. She generally began her sentences with, "Well, not to deceive you." Thus "Is Mr Plornish at home?" "Well, sir, not to deceive you, he's gone to look for a job." "Well, not to deceive you, ma'am, I take it kindly of you."—C. Dickens, Little Dorrit (1857)

Plotting Parlour (The). At Whittington, near Scarsdale, in Derbyshire, is a farm-house where the earl of Devonshire (Cavendish), the earl of Danby (Osborne), and baron Delamer (Booth) concerted the Revolution. The room in which they met is called "The Plotting Parlour."

Where Scarsdale's cliffs the swelling pastures bound, there I, the farmer's hall
The sacred orchard which embowers his gate
And show to strangers passing down the vale
Where Cavendish, Loothe and Osborne sat
When bursting from their country's chain
They planned for freedom this her noblest reign

Plousina, called Hebe, endowed by the fairy Anguiletta with the gifts of wit, beauty, and wealth. Hebe still felt she lacked something, and the fairy told her it was love. Presently came to her father's court a young prince named Atimir, the two fell in love with each other, and the day of their marriage was fixed. In the interval, Atimir fell in love with Hebe's elder sister Iberia, and Hebe, in her grief, was sent to the Peaceable Island, where she fell in love with the ruling prince, and married him. After a time, Atimir and Iberia, with Hebe and her husband, met at the palace of the ladies' father, when the love between Atimir and Hebe revived. A duel was fought between the young princes, in which Atimir was slain, and the prince of the Peaceable Islands was severely wounded. Hebe, coming up, threw herself on Atimir's sword, and the dead bodies of Atimir and Hebe were transformed into two trees called Flowman (Piers), the dreamer, who, falling asleep on the Malvern Hills, Worcestershire, saw in a vision pictures of the corruptions of society, and particularly of the avarice and wantonness of the clergy. This supposed vision is formed into a poetical satire of great vigour, fancy, and humour. It is divided into twenty parts, each part being called a passus or separate vision—William [or Robert] Langland, The Vision of Piers Plowman (1362)

Plumdamas (Mr. Pater), grocer—Sir W. Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II.)

Plume (Captain), a gentleman and an officer. He is in love with Sylvia a wealthy heiress, and, when he marries her, gives up his commission.—G. Larphear, The Recruiting Officer (1705)

Plummer (Caleb), a little old toy-maker, in the employ of Gruff and Tackleton, toy merchants. He was spare, grey-haired, and very poor. It was his pride "to go as close to nature in his toys as he could for the money." Caleb Plummer had a blind daughter, who assisted him in toy-making, and whom he brought up under the belief that he himself was young, handsome, and well off, and that the house they lived in was sumptuously furnished and quite magnificent. Every calamity he smoothed over, every unkind remark of their snarling employer he called a merry jest, so that the poor blind girl lived in a castle of the air, "a bright little world of her own." When merry or puzzled, Caleb used to sing something about "a jarkling bow!"

It would have saddened the heart of that immitable creator of Charles Dickens—Caleb Plummer—"Lord W. London Celebrities II."

Betha Plummer, the blind daughter of the toy-maker, who fancied her poor old father was a young fop, that the sack he threw across his shoulders was a handsome blue great-coat, and that their wooden house was a palace. She was in love with Tackleton, the toy merchant, whom she thought to be a handsome young prince, and when she heard that he was about to marry May Fielding, she dropped and was like to die. She was then disillusioned, heard the real facts, and said, "Why, oh, why did you deceive me thus? Why did you fill my heart so full, and then come like death, and tear away the objects of my love?" However, her love for her father was not lessened, and she declared that the knowledge of the truth was "sight restored." "It is my sight," she cried. "Hitherto I have been blind, but now my eyes are open. I never knew my father before, and might have died without ever having known him truly."

Plummer, son of the toy-maker, and brother of the blind girl. He was engaged from boyhood to May Fielding, went to South America, and returned to marry her, but, hearing of her engagement to Tackleton the toy merchant, he assumed the disguise of a deaf old man, to ascertain whether she loved Tackleton or not. Being satisfied that her heart was still his own, he married her, and Tackleton made them a present of the wedding cake which he had ordered for himself.—C. Dickens, The Cricket on the Hearth (1845)

Plush (John), a very gorgeous footman, conspicuous for his plush breeches and rainbow colours.

Plutarch (The Modern), Vaver, born at Paris. His name in full was Francis Vaver de la Mothe (1586-1672).

Pocket (Mr Matthew), a real scholar, educated at Harrow, and an honour-man at Cambridge, but, having married young, he had to take up the calling of "grinder"
and literary fag for a living. Mr Pocket, when annoyed, used to run his two hands into his hair, and seemed as if he intended to lift himself by it. His house was a hopeless muddle, the best meals and chief expense being in the kitchen. Pip was placed under the charge of this gentleman.

Mrs Pocket (Bulinda), daughter of a City knight, brought up to be an ornamental nonentity, helpless, shiftless, and useless. She was the mother of eight children, whom she allowed to "tumble up" as best they could under the charge of her maid Lapsion. Her husband, who was a poor gentleman, found life a very uphill work.

Herbert Pocket, son of Mr Matthew Pocket, and an insurer of ships. He was a frank, easy young man, lithe and brisk, but not muscular. There was nothing mean or secretive about him. He was wonderfully hopeful, but had not the stuff to push his way into wealth. He was tall slim, and pale, had a languor which shewed itself even in his briskness, was most amiable, cheerful, and communicative. He called Pip "fandel," because Pip had been a blacksmith, and Handel composed a piece of music entitled The Harmonious Blacksmith. Pip helped him to a partnership in an agency business.

Georgiana Podsnap, daughter of the above, called by her father "the young person." She is a harmless, inoffensive girl, "always trying to lude her elbows."
Georgiana adores Mrs Lammle, and when Mr Lammle tries to marry the girl to Mr Fledgeby, Mrs Lammle induces Mr Twemlow to speak to the father and warn him against the connection.

Poets' Corner, in the south transept of Westminster Abbey. No one knows who christened the corner thus. With poets are divines, philosophers, actors, novelists, architects, and critics. It would have been a glorious thing indeed if the corner had been set apart for England's poets. But alas! the deans of Westminster made a market of the wall, and hence, as a memorial of British poets, it is almost a caricature. Who is the record of Byron, Ford, Hemans, Keats, Keble, Marlowe, Massinger, Pope, Shelley? Where of F. B. Browning, Burns, Chatterton, Collins, Congreve, Cowper, Crabbe, Gower, Herbert, Herrick, Hood, Marvell, T. Moore, Scott, Shenstone, Southey, and Waller?

The "corner" contains a bust, statue, tablet, or monument to five of our first-rate poets: viz., Chaucer (1400), Dryden (1700), Milton (1674), Shakespeare (1616), and Spenser (1798), and some seventeen of second or third class merit, as Addison, Beaumont (none to Fletcher), S. Butler, Campbell, Cowley, Cumberland, Drayton, Gay, Gray, Goldsmith, Ben Jonson, Macaulay, Prior (a most preposterous affair), Rowe, Sheridan, Thomson, and Wordsworth. And also to such miserable poetasters as Davenant ("Oh! rare sir William Davenant"), Mason, and Shadwell. Truly, our Valhalla is almost a satire on our taste and judgment.

Poison. It is said that Mithridates VI., surnamed "the Great," had so fortified his constitution, that poisons had no beneficial effect on him (p. c. 131, 120-66).

Poison-Detectors. Opal turns pale, and Venetian glass shivers at the approach of poison. Peacocks ruffle their feathers at the sight of poison, and if poison is put into a liquid contained in a cup of rhinoceros horn, the liquid will effervesce. No one could pass with poison the horn gate of Gundoforus. Nourgehan had a bracelet, the stones of which seemed agitated when poison approached the wearer. Aladdin's ring was a preservative against every evil. The sign of the cross in the Middle Ages was looked upon as a poison-detector. (See WARNING-GIVINGS.)

Poison of Khaibar. By this is meant the poison put into a leg of mutton by Zainab, a Jewess, to kill Mahomet while he was in the citadel of Khaibar. Mahomet partook of the mutton, and suffered from the poison all through life.

Polish Jew (The), also called The Bride, a melodrama by J. R. Ware, brought prominently into note by the acting of Henry Irving at the Lyceum. Mathis, a miller in a small German town, is visited on Christmas Eve by a Polish Jew, who comes through the snow in a sledge. After rest and refreshment, he leaves for Nantzig, "four leagues off." Mathis follows him, kills him with an axe, and burns the body in a lime-kiln. He then pays his debts, becomes a prosperous and respected man, and is made burgomaster. On the wedding night of his only child, Annette, he dies of apoplexy, of which he had ample warning by the constant sound of sledge-bells in his ears. In his dream he supposes himself put into a mesmeric sleep in open court, when he confesses everything and is executed (1874)

Polixène, the name assumed by Madelon Gorgibus, a shopkeeper's daughter, as far more romantic and genteel than her baptismal name. Her cousin Cathos called herself Aminte (2 syl)

A ton juraits parlé "ask Madelon dans le beau style de Cathos ni de Madelon et ne manquez vous pas que ce soit assez d'un de ces noms pour, d'écarter le plus beau roman du monde"

Polixenes (4 syl), king of Bohemia, schoolfellow and old companion of Leontes king of Sicily. While on a visit to the Sicilian king, Leontes grew jealous of him, and commanded Camillo to poison him, but Camillo only warned him of his danger, and fled with him to Bohemia. Polixenes's son, Florizel, fell in love with Perdita the supposed daughter of a shepherd, but the king threatened Perdita and the shepherd with death unless this foolish suit were given up. Florizel and Perdita now fled to Sicily, where they were introduced to king Leontes, and it was soon discovered that Perdita was his lost daughter. Polixenes, having tracked the fugitives to Sicily, learned that Perdita was the king's daughter, and joyfully consented to the union he had before forbidden — Shakespeare, The Winter's Tale (1601)

Poll Pineapple, the bumboat woman, once sailed in seaman's clothes with lieutenant Belave' (2 syl), in the Hot Cross-Bun. Jack tars generally greetch each other with "Messmate, ho' what cheer?" but the greeting on the Hot Cross-Bun was always, "How do you do, my dear?" and never was any oath more naughty than "Dear me!" One day, lieutenant Belave came on board and said to his crew, "Here, messmates, is my wife, for I have just come from church." Whereupon they all fainted, and it was found the crew consisted of young women only, who had dressed like sailors to follow the fate of lieutenant Belave — S. Gilbert, The Bab Ballads ("The Bumboat Woman's Story")

Pollente (3 syl), a Saracen, lord of the Perilous Bridge. When his groom Guizor demands "the passage-penny" of sir Artegal, the knight gives him a "stunning blow," saying, "Lo' knave, there's my hire," and the groom falls down dead. Pollente then comes rushing up at full speed, and both he and sir Artegal fall into the river, fighting most desperately. At length sir Artegal prevails, and the dead body of the Saracen is earned down "the blood-stained stream"—Spenser, Faëry Queen, v 2 (196)

Upton conjectures that "Pollente" is intended for Charles IX of France, and his groom "Guizor" (he says) means the duke of Guise, noted for the part he took in the St Bartholomew Massacre

Polly, daughter of Peachum A pretty girl, who really loved captain Maheath, married him, and remained faithful even when he dishonoured her When the reprieve arrived, "the captain" confessed his marriage, and vowed to abide by Polly for the rest of his life—J Gay, The Beggar's Opera (1727)

This character has led to the peerage three actresses Miss Fenton (duchess of Bolton), Miss Bolton (lady Thurlow), and Miss Stephen (countess of Essex)

Mrs C Mathews says of Miss Fenton (1708-1760)

Both by singing, and acting the impression she made in Polly was most powerful. Not a paint-shop or fan-shop but exhibited her handsome figure in her Polly's costume which possessed all the characteristic simplicity of the modern quakeress without one mere trifling ornament.

Polonius, a garrulous old chamberlain of Denmark, and father of Laertes and Ophelia, conceited, politic, and a courtier Polonius conceals himself, to overhear what Hamlet says to his mother, and, making some unavoidable noise, startles the prince, who, thinking it is the king concealed, rushes blindly on the intruder, and kills him, but finds too late he has killed the chamberlain, and not Claudius as he hoped and expected—Shakespeare, Hamlet (1596)

Polonius is a man bold in courts, exercised in business, stored with observations, confident of his knowledge proud of his eloquence, and declining to dotage.—D Johnson

It was the great part of William Mynitt (1710-1763)

Son of Mr Munden retired from the stage an admirer met him in Covent Garden. It was a wet day and each carried an umbrella. The gentleman was an expensive silk one and Joe's an old gingham. So you have left the stage and Polonius, Jeremy Jump, Old Dornton and a dozen others have left the world with you? I wish you I gave me some trifle by way of memorial, Munden! Trifle, sir? I faith, sir I've got nothing. But hold! yes, equal, appear we exchange umbrellas.—Theatrical Anecdotes

Polwarth (Alick), a servant of Waverley's—Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Polye'tos (in Latin Polye'tus), a statuary of Sicily, who drew up a canon of the proportions of the several parts of the human body as, twice round the thumb is once round the wrist, twice round the wrist is once round the neck; twice round the neck is once round the waist, once round the fist is the length of the foot, the two arms extended is the height of the body, six times the length of the foot, or eighteen thumbs, is also the height of the body

Again, the thumb, the longest toe, and the nose should all be of the same length The index finger should measure the breadth of the hand and foot, and twice the breadth should give the length The hand, the foot, and the face should all be the same length The nose should be one-third of the face, and, of course, the thumbs should be one-third the length of the hand Gerard de Larosse has given the exact measurements of every part of the human figure, according to the famous statues of "Antinous," "Apollo Belvidere," "Hercules," and "Venus de Medici"

Polycrates (4 syl), tyrant of Samos He was so fortunate in everything, that Amasis king of Egypt advised him to part with something he highly prized Whereupon, Polycrates threw into the sea an engraved gem of extraordinary value A few days afterwards, a fish was presented to the tyrant, in which this very gem was found Amasis now renounced all friendship with him, as a man doomed by the gods, and not long after this, a satrap, having entrapped the too fortunate despot, put him to death by crucifixion (See I SITH AND THE RING)—Herodotus, in 40

Polyd'amas, a Thessalian athlete of enormous strength He is said to have killed an angry lion, to have held by the heels a raging bull and thrown it helpless at his feet, to have stopped a chariot in full career, etc One day, he attempted to sustain a falling rock, but was killed and buried by the huge mass

Milo carried a bull, four years old, on his shoulders through the stadium at Olympia, he also arrested a chariot in full career One day, tearing asunder a pine tree, the two parts, rebounding, caught his hands and held him fast, in which state he was devoured by wolves

Polydore (3 syl), the name by which Belarius called prince Guiderius, while he lived in a cave in the Welsh mountains His brother, prince Arrvragus, went by the name of Cadwal—Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605)

Polydore (3 syl), brother of general Memnon, beloved by the princess Calp sister of Astorax king of Paphos — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Mad Lover (1618)

Polydore (Lord), son of lord Acasto, and Castalio's younger brother. He entertained a base passion for his father's ward Monimia "the orphan," and, making use of the signal ("three soft taps upon the chamber door") to be used by Castalio, to whom she was privately married, indulged his wanton love, Monimia supposing him to be her husband. When, next day, he discovered that Monimia was actually married to Castalio, he was horrified, and provoked a quarrel with his brother, but as soon as Castalio drew his sword, he ran upon it and was killed — Thomas Otway, The Orphan (1680)

Polydore (3 syl), a comrade of I must of Otranto (page of prince Tancred) — Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Polyglot (Ignatus), the master of seventeen languages, and tutor of Charles Lustace (aged 21). Very learned, very ignorant of human life, most strict as a disciplinarian, but tender-hearted as a girl. His pupil has married clandestinely, but Polyglot offers himself voluntarily to be the scapegoat of the young couple, and he brings them off triumphantly — J. Poole, The Scapegoat

Polyglott (A Walling), cardinal Merzofanti, who knew fifty-eight different languages (1771-1819)

Polypheme (3 syl), a gigantic Cyclops of Sicily, who fed on human flesh. When Ulysses, on his return from Troy, was driven to this island, he and twelve of his companions were seized by Polypheme, and confined in his cave, that he might devour two daily for his dinner. Ulysses made the giant drunk, and, when he lay down to sleep, bored out his one eye. Roused by the pain, the monster tried to catch his tormentors, but Ulysses and his surviving companions made their escape by clinging to the bellies of the sheep and rams when they were let out to pasture (Odyssey, iv.)

There is a Basque legend told of the giant Tartaro, who caught a young man in his snare, and confined him in his cave for dessert. When, however, Tartaro fell asleep, the young man made the giant's spit red hot, bored out his one eye, and then made his escape by fixing the bell of the bell-ram round his neck, and a sheep-skin over his back. Tartaro seized the skin, and the man, leaving it behind, made off — Basque Legends.

A very singular adventure forms the tale of Sindbad's third voyage, in the Arabian Nights. He was shipwrecked on a strange island, and entered, with his companions, a sort of palace. At nightfall, a one-eyed giant entered, and ate one of them for supper, and another for breakfast next morning. This went on for a day or two, when Sindbad bored out the giant's one eye with a charred olive stake. The giant tried in vain to catch his tormentors, but they ran to their rafts, and Sindbad, with two others, contrived to escape.

Poor Gentleman (The), a comedy by George Colman the younger (1802).
"The poor gentleman" is lieutenant Worthington, discharged from the army on half-pay, because his arm had been crushed by a shell in storming Gibraltar.
On his half-pay he had to support himself, his daughter Emily, an old corporal, and a maiden sister-in-law. Having put his name to a bill for £500, his friend died without effecting an insurance, and the lieutenant was called upon for payment. Imprisonment would have followed if Sir Robert Bramble had not most generously paid the money. With this piece of good fortune came another—the marriage of his daughter Emily to Frederick Bramble, nephew and heir of the rich baronet.

Pope Changing His Name Peter
Hogsmouth, or, as he is sometimes called,
Peter di Porea, was the first pope to change his name. He called himself Sergius II (844-847). Some say he thought it arrogant to be called Peter II.

Pope-Fig-lands, protestant countries. The Gaillardets, being shown the pope's image, said, "A fig for the pope!"
whereupon their whole island was put to the sword, and the name changed to Pope-fig-land, the people being called "Pope-figs"—Rabelais, Pantagruel, iv
45 (1545).

The allusion is to the kingdom of Navarre, once protestant, but in 1512 it was subjected to Ferdinand the Catholic.

Pope-Figs, protestants. The name was given to the Gaillardets, for saying,
"A fig for the pope!"

They were made tributaries and slaves to the Papists for saying, "A fig for the pope's image!" and never after did the poor wretches prosper but every year the devil was at their doors, and they were plagued with hail storms famine, and all manner of woes in punishment of this sin of their forefathers.—Babelais, Pantagruel, iv 15 (1542).

Pope Joan, between Leo IV and Benedict III, and called John [VIII]. The subject of this scandalous story was an English girl, educated at Cologne, who left her home in man's disguise with her lover (the monk Folda), and went to Athens, where she studied law. She went to Rome and studied theology, earning so great a reputation that, at the death of Leo IV, she was chosen his successor. Her sex was discovered by the birth of a child while she was going to the Lateran Basilica, between the Coliseum and the church of St Clement. Pope Joan died, and was buried, without honours, after a pontificate of two years and five months (853-855) — Marcanus Scotus (who died 1086).

The story is given most fully by Martinus Polonus, confessor to Gregory X, and the tale was generally believed till the Reformation. There is a German miracle-play on the subject, called The Canonization of Pope Joan (1480). David Blondel, a Calvinist divine, has written a book to confute the tale.

The following note contains the chief points of interest —

Anastasius the librarian, is the first to mention such a pope, a D 886, or thirty years after the death of Joan.

Marrinus Scotus, in his Chronicle, says she reigned two years five months and four days (853-855). Scotus died 1086.

Sigebert de Gemblours, in his Chronicle, repeats the same story (1112).

Otto of Freisingen and Gotfrid of Viterbo both mention her in their histories.

Martin Polonus gives a very full account of the matter. He says she went by the name of John Anglus, and was born at Metz, of English parents. While she was pope, she was prematurely delivered of a child in the street "between the Coliseum and St Clement's Church."

William Oehm alludes to the story.

Thomas de Linham repeats it (1422).

John Huss tells us her baptismal name was not Joan but Agnes.

Others insist that her name was Gilberta.

In the Annals Augustini (1135), we are told her papal name was John VIII, and that she it was who consecrated Louis of France.

Arguments in favour of the allegation are given by Spanheim, Excerpt de Papa

Tamnia, ii 577, in Lenfant, Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne.

Arguments against the allegation are given by Allatius or Allatus, Consulatio Fabulæ de Johanna Papissa, and in Leguier, Oriens Christianus, iii 777.

Arguments on both sides are given in Cunningham's translation of Geseler, Lehrbuch, ii 21, 22, and in La Bayle's Dictionnaire, iii, art "Papisse."

* * Gibbon says, "Two protestants, Blondel and Bayle, have annihilated the female pope, but the expression is certainly too strong, and even Mosheim is more than half inclined to believe there really was such a person."

Pope of Philosophy, Aristotle (B C 384-322).

Popes (Titles assumed by) "Universal Bishop," prior to Gregory the Great. Gregory the Great adopted the style of "Servus Servorum" (591).

Martin IV was addressed as "the lamb of God which takest away the sins of the world," to which was added, "Grant us thy peace!" (1281).

Leo X was styled, by the council of Lateran, "Divine Majesty," "Husband of the Church," "Prince of the Apostles," "The key of all the Universe," "The Pastor, the Physician, and a God possessed of all power both in heaven and on earth" (1513).

Paul V styled himself "Monarch of Christendom," "Supporter of the Papal Omnipotence," "Vice-God," "Lord God the Pope" (1605).

Others, after Paul, "Master of the World," "Pope the Universal Father," "Judge in the place of God," "Vicerent of the Most High"—Brady, Clavis Calendaria, 247 (1839).

The pope assumes supreme dominion not only over spiritual but also over temporal affairs, styling himself Head of the Catholic or Universal Church, Sole Arbitrator of its Rights and Sovereign Father of all the Kings of the Earth. From these titles, he wears a triple crown, one as high priest, one as emperor and the third as king. He also bears keys to denote his privilege of opening the gates of heaven to all true believers.—Brady 250-1.

* * For the first five centuries the bishops of Rome wore a bonnet, like other ecclesiasties. Pope Hormisdas placed on his bonnet the crown sent him by Clovis, Boniface VIII added a second crown during his struggles with Philip the Fair, and John XXII assumed the third crown.

Popish Plot, a supposed Roman Catholic conspiracy to massacre the protestants, burn London, and murder the king (Charles II) This fiction was concocted by one Titus Oates, who made a "good thing" by his schemes, but being at last found out, was pilloried, whipped, and imprisoned (1678-9)

Shakespeare Julius Cæsar act iv sc 3 (1607)

Portia, a rich heiress, in love with Bassanio, but her choice of a husband was restricted by her father's will to the following condition Her suitors were to select from three caskets, one of gold, one of silver, and one of lead, and he who selected the casket which contained Portia's picture was to claim her as his wife Bassanio chose the lead, and being successful, became the espoused husband It so happened that Bassanio had borrowed 3000 ducats, and Anthonio, a Venetian merchant, was his security. The money was borrowed of Shillock a Jew, on these conditions: If the loan was repaid within three months, only the principal would be required, if not, the Jew should be at liberty to claim a pound of flesh from Anthonio's body. The loan was not repaid, and the Jew demanded the forfeiture. Portia, in the dress of a law doctor, conducted the defence, and saved Anthonio by reminding the Jew that a pound of flesh gave him no drop of blood, and that he must cut neither more nor less than an exact pound, otherwise his life would be forfeit. As it would be plainly impossible to fulfil these conditions, the Jew gave up his claim, and Anthonio was saved.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice (1598)

Posthumus [Li o'xtus] married Imogen, daughter of Cymbeline king of Britain, and was banished the kingdom for life. He went to Italy, and there, in the house of Philario, bet a diamond ring with Iachimo that nothing could seduce the fidelity of Imogen. Iachimo accepted the bet, concealed himself in a chest in Imogen's chamber, made himself master of certain details and also of a bracelet, and with these vouchers claimed the ring. Posthumus now ordered his servant Pisanio to inveigle Imogen to Milford Haven under the promise of meeting her husband, and to murder her on the road, but Pisanio told Imogen to assume boy's apparel, and enter the service of the Roman general in Britain, as a page. A battle being fought, the Roman general, Iachimo, and Imogen were among the captives, and Posthumus, having done great service in the battle on Cymbeline's behalf, was pardoned. The Roman general prayed that the supposed page might be set at liberty, and the king told her she might also claim a boon, whereupon she asked that Iachimo should state how he became possessed of the ring he was wearing. The whole villainy being thus exposed, Imogen's innocence was fully established, and she was reunited to her husband.—Shakespeare, Cymbeline (1605)

Potage (Jern), the French "Jack Pudding," similar to the Italian "Macaroni," the Dutch "Pickel-herringe," and the German "Hanswurst." Clumsy, formidantizing clown, fond of practical jokes, especially such as sterling eatables and drinkables.

Pother (Doctor), an apothecary, "city register, and walking story-book." He had a story a propos of every remark made and of every incident, but as he mixed two or three together, his stories were pointless and quite unintelligible. "I'll now a monstrous good story on that point. He! he! he!" "I'll tell you a famous good story about that, you must know. He! he! he!" "I could have told a capital story, but there was no one to listen to it. He! he! he!" This is the style of his chattering. "speaking professionally—for anatomy, chemistry, pharmacy, phlebotomy, oxygen, hydrogen, caloric, carbonic, atmospheric, galvanic. Ha! ha! ha! Pragmatic Sanction. The word pragmaticus means "relating to State affairs," and the word sanctio means "an ordinance" or "decree." The four most famous statutes so called are

1 The Pragmatic Sanction of St Louis (1268), which forbade the court of Rome to levy taxes or collect subscriptions in France without the express permission of the king. It also gave permission in certain cases of French subjects appealing from the ecclesiastical to the civil courts of the realm

2 The Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, passed by Charles VII of France in 1388. By this ordinance, the power of the pope in France was limited and defined. The authority of the National Council was declared superior to that of the pope. The French clergy were forbidden to appeal to Rome on any point affecting the secular condition of the nation, and the Roman pontiff was wholly forbidden to appropriate to himself any vacant living, or to appoint to any bishopric or parish church in France.

3 The Pragmatic Sanction of Iaiser Karl VI of Germany (in 1713), which settled the empire on his daughter, the archduchess Maria Theresa, wife of Francois de Lorraine. Maria Theresa ascended the throne in 1740, and a European war was the result.

4 The Pragmatic Sanction of Charles III of Spain (1767). This was to suppress the Jesuits of Spain.

What is meant emphatically by The Pragmatic Sanction is the third of these ordinances, viz, settling the line of succession in Germany on the house of Austria.

Prasildo, a Babylonish nobleman, who falls in love with Tisbina wife of his friend Iroldo. He is overheard by Tisbina threatening to kill himself, and, in order to divert him from his guilty passion, she promises to return his love on condition of his performing certain adventures which she thinks to be impossible. However, Prasildo performs them all, and then Tisbina and Iroldo, finding no excuse, take poison to avoid the alternative. Prasildo resolves to do the same, but is told by the apothecary that the "poison" he had supplied was a harmless drink. Prasildo tells his

Prattle (Mr), medical practitioner, a voluble gossip, who relates all the news and scandal of the neighbourhood. He knows everybody, everybody's affairs, and everybody's intentions.—G. Colman, senior, The Doctor is in Him (1762)

Prayer Ivers Mohammedan must pray five times a day—at sunset, at nightfall, at daybreak, at noon, and at Asr or evensong (about three o'clock)

Pre-Adamite Kings, Soliman Rud, Soliman Dahi, and Soliman di Gian ben Gian. The last-named, having chained up the dives (1 syl) in the dark caverns of Kaf, became so presumptuous as to dispute the Supreme Power. All these kings maintained great state [before the existence of that contemptible being denominated by us "The Father of Mankind"], but none can be compared with the eminence of Soliman ben Droud

Pre-Adamite Throne (The). It was Vathel's ambition to gain the pre-Adamite throne. After long search, he was shown it at last in the abysses of Iblis, but being there, return was impossible, and he remained a prisoner without hope for ever.

They reached at length the ball [Argent] of great extent and covered with a lustrous silver. A funeral gloom prevailed over it. Here upon two beds of incarnatilla's color lay recumbent the Pithless forms of the pre-Adamite kings, who had once been monarchs of the whole earth. At their feet were inscribed the events of their several reigns, their power, their pride and their crimes. [This was the pre-Adamite throne, the ambition of the earthly Vathel.]—W. Lockhart, Fat et

Preacher (The), Solomon, the son of David, author of The Preacher (see Ecclesiastes)

It is with the Preacher—A night hermit of the "new" ye will from charm to change we run.
 Byron.

Preacher (The Glorious), St. Chrysostom (347–407). The name means "Golden mouth."

Preacher (The Little), Samuel de Marez, protestant controversialist (1597–1667)

Preacher (The Unfair). Dr Isaac Harrow was so called by Charles II., because his sermons were so exhaustive that they left nothing more to be said on the subject, which was "unfair" to those who came after him.

Preachers (The King of), Louis Bourdaloue (1672–1704)

Précieuses Ridicules (The), a comedy by Molière, in ridicule of the "précieuses," as they were styled forming the coterie of the Hotel de Rambouillet in the seventeenth century. The scene held in this hotel were a great improvement on the tedious assemblies of the period, but many imitators made the thing ridiculous, because they wanted the same pre-iding talent and good taste.

The two girls of Molière's comedy are Madelon and Cathos, the daughter and niece of Gorgibus a bourgeois. They change their names to Polixène and Aminte, which they think more genteel, and look on the affectations of two dunces as far more distinguished than the simple gentlemanly manners of their parents. However, they are cured of their folly, and no harm comes of it (1659)

Primrose (The Rev Dr Charles), a clergyman, rich in heavenly wisdom, but poor indeed in all worldly knowledge Amiable, charitable, devoted; but not without his literary vanity, especially on the Whistonian theory about second marriages One admires his virtuous indignation against the "washes," which he deliberately demolished with the poker In his prosperity, his chief "adventures were by the fireside, and all his migrations were from the blue bed to the brown"

Mrs [Deborah] Primrose, the doctor's wife, full of motherly vanity, and desirous to appear genteel She could read without much spelling, prided herself on her housewifery, especially on her gooseberry wine, and was really proud of her excellent husband

(She was painted as "Venus," and the vicar, in gown and bands, was presenting to her his book on "second marriages," but when complete the picture was found to be too large for the house)

George Primrose, son of the vicar He went to Amsterdam to teach the Dutch English, but never once called to mind that he himself must know something of Dutch before this could be done He becomes captain Primrose, and marries Miss Wilmot, an heiress

(Goldsmith himself went to teach the French English under the same circumstances)

Moses Primrose, younger son of the vicar, noted for his greenness and pe-dantry Being sent to sell a good horse at a fair, he bartered it for a gross of green spectacles, with copper rims and shagreen cases, of no more value than Hodge's razors (ch. xii)

Olivia Primrose, the eldest daughter of the doctor Pretty, enthusiastic, a sort of Hebe in beauty "She wished for many lovers," and eloped with squire Thornhill Her father found her at a roadside inn, called the Harrow, where she was on the point of being turned out of the house Subsequently, she was found to be legally married to the squire

Sophia Primrose, the second daughter of Dr Primrose She was "soft, modest, and alluring" Not like her sister, desirous of winning all, but fixing her whole heart upon one Being thrown from her horse into a deep stream, she was rescued by Mr Burchell (alias sir William Thornhill), and being abducted, was again rescued by him She married him at last.—Goldsmith, Vicar of Wakefield (1766)

Primum Mobile (The), a sphere which revolved in twenty-four hours from east to west, carrying with it the planets and fixed stars

Here is the goal whence motion on his race
Starts motionless the centre and the rest
All moved around Except the soul divine
Place in this heaven hath none
Measured itself by none it doth divide

Prince's Peers, a term of contempt applied to peers of low birth The phrase arose in the reign of Charles VII of France, when his son Louis (afterwards Louis XI) created a host of riff-raff peers, such as tradesmen, farmers, and mechanics, in order to degrade the aristocracy, and thus weaken its influence in the state

Printed Books The first book produced in England was printed in England in 1177, by William Caxton in the Almonry at Westminster, and was entitled The Dictes and Sayings of the Philosophers

The Rev T Wilson says "The press at Oxford existed ten years before there was any press in Europe, except those of Harlem and Mentz" The person who set up the Oxford press was Corsellis, and his first printed book bore the date of 1468 The colophon of it ran thus "Explicit expositio Sancti Jeronimi in simbolo apostolorum ad papam laurencium Impressa Oxonii Et finita Anno Domini Mccccxviij, xviij die Decembris" The book is a small quarto of forty-two leaves, and was first noticed in 1661 by Richard Atkins in his Origin and Growth of Printing. Dr Convers Middleton, in 1735, charged Atkins with forgery. In 1812 S W Singer defended the book. Dr Cotton took the subject up in his Typographical Gazetteer (first and second series).

Prior (Matthew) The monument to this poet in Westminster Abbey was by Risbrack, executed by order of Louis XIV.

Priory (Lord), an old-fashioned husband, who actually thinks that a wife should "love, honour, and obey" her husband, nay, more, that "forsaking all others, she should cleave to him so long as they both should live."

Lady Priory, an old-fashioned wife, but young and beautiful. She was, however, so very old-fashioned that she went to bed at ten and rose at six, dressed in a cap and gown of her own making, respected and loved her husband, discouraged flirtation, and when assailed by any improper advances, instead of showing temper or conceited airs, quietly and tranquilly seated herself to some modest household duty till the assailant felt the irresistible power of modesty and virtue.—Mrs Inchbald, Wives as They Were and Maids as They Are (1797).

Priscian, a great grammarian of the fifth century. The Latin phrase, Diminuere Prisciani caput ("to break Priscian's head"), means to "violate the rules of grammar." (See PEGASUS.)

Priscilla, daughter of a noble lord. She fell in love with sir Aladine, a poor knight.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, vi. 1 (1596).

Priscilla, the beautiful puritan in love with John Alden. When Miles Standish, a bluff old soldier in the middle of life, wished to marry her, he asked John Alden to go and plead his cause, but the puritan maiden replied archly, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" Soon after this, Standish being killed, as it was supposed by a poisoned arrow, John did speak for himself, and Priscilla listened to his seduction.—Longfellow, The Courtship of Miles Standish (1858).

Prison Life Endear'd. The following are examples of prisoners who, from long habit, have grown attached to prison life.—

Comte de Lorge was confined for thirty years in the Bastille, and when liberated (July 14, 1789) declared that freedom had no joys for him. After imploring in vain to be allowed to return to his dungeon, he lingered for six weeks and pined to death.

Goldsmith says, when Chinwang the Chaste ascended the throne of China, he commanded the prisons to be thrown open. Among the prisoners was a venerable man of 85 years of age, who implored that he might be suffered to return to his cell. For sixty-three years he had lived in its gloom and solitude, which he preferred to the glare of the sun and the bustle of a city.—A Citizen of the World, LXXIII (1759).

Mr Cogan once visited a prisoner of state in the King's Bench prison, who told him he had grown to like the subdued light and extreme solitude of his cell, he even liked the spots and patches on the wall, the hardness of his bed, the regularity, and the freedom from all the cares and worries of active life. He did not wish to be released, and felt sure he should never be so happy in any other place.

A woman of Leyden, on the expiration of a long imprisonment, applied for permission to return to her cell, and added, if the request were refused as a favour, she would commit some offence which should give her a title to her old quarters.

A prisoner condemned to death had his sentence commuted for seven years' close confinement on a bed of nails. After the expiration of five years, he declared, if ever he were released, he should adopt from choice what habit had rendered so agreeable to him.

Prisoner of Chillon, François de Bonnavard, a Frenchman who resided at Geneva, and made himself obnoxious to Charles III. duc de Savoie, who incarcerated him for six years in a dungeon of the Château de Chillon, at the east end of the lake of Geneva. The prisoner was ultimately released by the Bernese, who were at war with Savoy.

Byron has founded on this incident his poem entitled The Prisoner of Chillon, but has added two brothers, whom he supposes to be imprisoned with François, and who died of hunger, suffering, and confinement. In fact, the poet mixes up,

Dantè's tale about count Ugolino with that of François de Bonnavard, and has produced a powerful and affecting story, but it is not historic

Prisoner of State (The), Ernest do Fridberg J. Stirling has a drama so called (For the plot, see ERNEST DE FRIDBERG)

Probe (1 syl), a priggish surgeon, who magnifies mole-hill ailments into mountain maladies, in order to enhance his skill and increase his charges Thus, when lord Foppington received a small flesh-wound in the arm from a foil, Probe drew a long face, frightened his lordship greatly, and pretended the consequences might be serious, but when lord Foppington promised him £500 for a cure, he set his patient on his legs the next day—Sheridan, A Trip to Scarborough (1777)

Pro'cida (John of), a tragedy by S,

Knowles (1840) John of Procida was an Italian gentleman of the thirteenth century, a skilful physician, high in favour with king Fernando II, Conrad, Manfred, and Conradine The French invaded the island, put the last two monarchs to the sword, usurped the sovereignty, and made Charles d'Anjou king The cruelty, licentiousness, and extortion of the French being quite unbearable, provoked a general rising of the Sicilians, and in one night (the Sicilian Vespers, March 30, 1282), every Frenchman, Frenchwoman, and French child in the whole island was ruthlessly butchered Procida lost his only son Fernando, who had just married Isoline (3 syl), the daughter of the French governor of Messina Isoline died broken-hearted, and her father, the governor, was amongst the slain The crown was given to John of Procida

Procris, the wife of Cephalos Out of jealousy, she crept into a wood to catch a spy upon her husband Cephalos, hearing something move, discharged an arrow in the direction of the rustling, thinking it to be caused by some wild beast, and shot Procris Jupiter, in pity, turned Procris into a star—Greek and Latin Mythology

The unerring dart of Procris Diana gave Procris a dart which never missed its aim, and after being discharged returned back to the shooter

Procrustes (3 syl), a highwayman of Attica, who used to place travellers on a bed, if they were too short he stretched them out till they fitted it, if too long he lopped off the redundant part—Greek Mythology

Critic, more cruel than Procrustes old,
Who to his iron bed by torture fits

As Prognê or as Philomela mourns
So Bradwardine laments her absent knight.
Aristo Orlando Furioso xliii. (1516)

Prome'thean Unguent (The), made from the extract of a herb on which some of the blood of Prometheus (3 syl) had fallen Medea gave Jason some of this unguent, which rendered his body proof against fire and warlike instruments

Prome'theus (3 syl) taught man the use of fire, and instructed him in architecture, astronomy, mathematics, writing, rearing cattle, navigation, medicine, the art of prophecy, working metal, and, indeed, every art known to man The word means "forethought," and forethought is the father of invention The tale is that he made man of clay, and, in order to endow his clay with life, stole fire from heaven and brought it to earth in a hollow tube Zeus, in punishment, chained him to a rock, and sent an eagle to consume his liver daily, during the night it grew again, and thus his torment was ceaseless, till Hercules shot the eagle, and unchained the captive underneath an ale-house paltry sign

The Castle in St. Alban's Somerset
Hath made the wizard famous in his death
Shakespeare 2 Henry VI act v sc 2 (1591)

Similar prophetic equivokes were told to Henry IV., pope Sylvester II., and Cambyses (see JERUSALEM, p. 492)

Aristomachus was told by the Delphic oracle to "flee for his life when he saw a goat drink from the river Neda" Consequently, all goats were driven from the banks of this river, but one day, Theocelos observed that the branches of a fig tree bent into the stream, and it immediately flashed into his mind that the Messenian word for fig tree and goat was the same The pun or equivoke will be better understood by an English reader if for goat we read cue, and bear in mind that yew is to the ear the same word, thus

When a cue (yew) stoops to drink of the ' Severn,' then fly
And look not behind for destruction is nigh.

Prophet (The), Mahomet (570-632)

The Mohammedans entertained an inconceivable veneration for their prophet. Whenever he made his ablutions they ran and caught the water he had used and when he spat, licked up the spittle with superstitious eagerness—Abulfeida, Life of Mahomet, 85 (thirteenth century)

Prophet Elm, an elm growing in Credenhill Court, belonging to the Echley family It is so called because one of the branches is said to snap off, and thus announce an approaching death in the family

Aristogiton, from being dipped in the Achelōus (4 syl), received the power of changing his form at will—Fénelon, Télémaque, x x (1700)

The genus, both good and bad, of Eastern mythology had the power of changing their form instantaneously This is powerfully illustrated by the combat between the Queen of Beauty and the son of Eblis The genies first appeared as an enormous lion, but the Queen of Beauty plucked out a hair which became a scythe, with which she cut the lion in pieces The head of the lion now became a scorpion, and the princess changed herself into a serpent, but the scorpion instantly made itself an eagle, and went in pursuit of the serpent The serpent, however, being vigilant, assumed the form of a white cat, the eagle in an instant changed to a wolf, and the cat, being hard pressed, changed into a worm, the wolf changed to a cock, and ran to pick up the worm, which, however, became a fish before the cock could pick it up. Not to be outwitted, the cock transformed itself into a pike to devour the fish, but the fish changed into a fire, and the son of Eblis was burnt to ashes before he could make another change—Arabian Nights ("The Second Calender")

Proteus or Prothrus, one of the two gentlemen of Verona. He is in love with Julia. His servant is Launce, and his father Anthonio or Antonio. The other gentleman is called Valentine, and his lady-love is Silvia—Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona (1591)

Shakespeare calls the word Pro'te-us Malone, Dr Johnson, etc., retain the h in both names, but the Globe edition omits them

Protevangelon ("first evangelist"), a gospel falsely attributed to St James the Less, first bishop of Jerusalem, noted for its minute details of the Virgin and Jesus Christ. Said to be the production of L Carinus of the second century

First of all we shall rehearse
The nativity of our Lord,
As written in the old record
Of the Protevangelon.
Longfellow The Golden Legend (1831)

Protocol (Mrs Peter), the attorney in Edinburgh employed by Mrs Margaret Bertram of Singleside—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Proteosebastos (The) or SEBASTOCRATOR, the highest State officer in Greece—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Protospathaire (The), or general of Alexis Comnenus emperor of Greece. His name is Nicanor—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Proud (The) Tarquin II of Rome was called Superbus (reigned b.c. 535-510, died 496)

Otto IV Kaiser of Germany was called "The Proud" (1175, 1203-1218)

Proud Duke (The), Charles Seymour duke of Somerset. His children were not allowed to sit in his presence, and he spoke to his servants by signs only (*-1748)

Proud and Mighty (The)

A little rule, a little way,
A gentleman in a wiser day
Is all the proud and mighty have
He won the trade and the grave
Pier Orange Bill (1631-35)

Proudfute (Our), the bustling bonnet-maker at Perth

Majdalen or Maudie Proudfoot, Oliver's widow—Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Prout (Father), the pseudonym of Francis Mahoney, a humorous writer in Friser's Magazine, etc (1865-1866)

Provis, the name assumed by Abel Magwitch, Pip's father. He was a convict, who had made a fortune, and whose chief desire was to make his son a gentleman—C Dickens, Great Expectations (1860)

Provoked Husband (The), a comedy by Cibber and Vanbrugh. The "provoked husband" is Lord Townly, justly annoyed at the conduct of his young wife, who wholly neglects her husband and her home duties for a life of gambling and dissipation. The husband, seeing no hope of amendment, resolves on a separate maintenance, but then the lady's eyes are opened—she promises amendment, and is forgiven

* * This comedy was Vanbrugh's Journey to London, left unfinished at his death. Cibber took it, completed it, and brought it out under the title of The Provoked Husband (1728)

Provoked Wife (The), Lady Brute, the wife of sir John Brute, is, by his ill manners, brutality, and neglect, "provoked" to intrigue with one Constant. The intrigue is not of a very serious nature, since it is always interrupted before it makes head. At the conclusion, sir John says

Early I may be stubborn I am not,
For I have both forgiven and forgot.
Sir J Vanbrugh (1697)

Provost of Bruges (The), a tragedy based on "The Serf," in Leitch Ritchie's Romance of History. Published anonymously in 1836, the author is S Knowles. The plot is this. Charles "the Good," earl of Flanders, made a law that a serf is always a serf till manumitted, and whoever marries a serf becomes thereby a serf. Thus, if a prince married the daughter of a serf, the prince became a serf himself, and all his children were serfs Bertulphe, the richest, wisest, and bravest man in Flanders, was provost of Bruges. His beautiful daughter Constance married sir Bouchard, a knight of noble descent, but Bertulphe's father had been Thane-mars serf, and, according to the new law, Bertulphe the provost, his daughter Constance, and his knightly son-in-law were all the serfs of Thane-mars. The provost killed the earl, and stabbed himself, Bouchard and Thane-mars killed each other in fight, and Constance died demented.

Prowler (Hugh), any vagrant or highway man.

For fear of Hugh Prowler get home with th' rest.
T. Tupper, Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry xxxiii. 23 (1837).

Prudence (Mistress), the lady attendant on Violet ward of lady Arundel. When Norman "the sea-captain" made love to Violet, Mistress Prudence remonstrated, "What will the countess say if I allow myself to see a stranger speaking to her ward?" Norman eloped a guinea on her left eye, and asked, "What see you now?" "Why, nothing with my left eye," she answered, "but the right has still a morbid sensibility." "Poor thing!" said Norman, "this golden ointment soon will cure it. What see you now, my Prudence?" "Not a soul," she said—Lord Lytton, The Sea-Captain (1839).

Prudes for proctors, dowagers for deans—Tennyson, prologue of The Princess (1830).

Prudhomme (Joseph), "pupil of Brard and Saint-Omer," calligraphist and sworn expert in the courts of law. Joseph Prudhomme is the synthesis of bourgeois imbecility, radiant, serene, and self-satisfied, letting fall from his fat lips "one weak, washy, everlasting flood" of puerile aphorisms and inane circumlocutions. He says, "The ear of the state floats on a precipice." "This sword is the proudest day of my life"—Henri Monnier, Grandes et Petites de Joseph Prudhomme (1862).

No creation of modern fiction ever embodied a phase of the human character with such original power as that of M. Joseph Prudhomme. "The man" is the final product of a nature so fertilized with ponderance and baseness. In 1862 Monnier turned it all free into a play, entitled Les Opinions de M. Joseph Prudhomme—L. G. R.

Prue (Miss), a schoolgirl still under the charge of a nurse, very precocious and very injudiciously brought up. Miss Prue is the daughter of Mr Foresight a mad astrologer, and Mrs Foresight a frail nonentity—Congreve, Love for Love (1695).

The love-scene between Jack Bannister (1763-1837) and 'Tittle' and 'Miss Prue' when this latter part was acted by Mrs Jordan, was probably never surpassed in rich natural comedy—F. Leyce da.

Prunes and Prisms, the words which give the lips the right phie of the highly aristocratic mouth, as Mrs General tells Amy Dorrit.

Papa gives a pretty form to the lips. 'Papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes and prisms.' You will find it serviceable if you say to yourself on entering a room 'Papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes, and prisms.'—C. Dickens, Little Dorrit (1855).

General Burgoyne, in The Heiress, makes lady Emily tell Miss Alscrip that the magic words are "nimini pimini," and that if she will stand before her mirror and pronounce these words repeatedly, she cannot fail to give her lips that happy phie which is known as the "Paphian nump"—The Heiress, iii. 2 (1781).

Prusio, king of Altreechia, slain by Zerbi'no—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516).

Pry (Paul), one of those idle, meddling fellows, who, having no employment of their own, are perpetually interfering in the affairs of other people—John Poole, Paul Pry.

Prydwen or Pindwin (q r), called in the Mabinogion the ship of king Arthur. It was also the name of his shield. Taliesin speaks of it as a ship, and Robert of Gloucester as a shield.

Myself that I let Prydwen
Shed ye, and he was prind that so strong was a shield, Calbourne it was called, his coat of arms were
In ye shield I found ye lance he rom the prind was I on.
L. 114.

Prynno (Hester), in Hawthorne's novel entitled The Scarlet Letter (1850).

Psalmist (The). King David is called "The Sweet Psalmist of Israel" (2 Sam. xxiii. 1). In the compilation called Psalms, in the Old Testament, seventy-three bear the name of David, twelve were composed by Asaph, eleven by the sons of Korah, and one (Psalter) by Moses.

Psalter of Tarah or Tara a name in which the early kings of Ireland inserted all historic events and arrangements. It began in the reign of Ollam Follah, of the family of Ir, n.e. 540, and was read to the assembled princes when the, met in the convention which assembled in the great hall of that splendid palace Also called Tara's Peallery

Their tribe they said, their blood free
Was sung in Tara's Peallery
Campbell, O'Connor's Child

Psycarpax (i.e. "granary-thief"), son of Trovartas king of the mice The frog king offered to carry the young Psycarpax over a lake, but a water-hydra made its appearance, and the frog king, to save himself, dived under water, whereby the mouse prince lost his life This catastrophe brought about the fatal Battle of the Frogs and Mice. Translated from the Greek into English verse by Parrell (1679-1717)

Psyché [Sī'kē], a most beautiful maiden, with whom Cupid fell in love The god told her she was never to seek to know who he was, but Psyché could not resist the curiosity of looking at him as he lay asleep A drop of the hot oil from Psyché's lamp falling on the love-god woke him, and he instantly took to flight Psyché now wandered from place to place, persecuted by Venus, but after enduring ineffable troubles, Cupid came at last to her rescue, married her, and bestowed on her immortality

This exquisite allegory is from the Golden Age of Apulcius Lafontaine has turned it into French verse M Laprade (born 1812) has rendered it into French most exquisitely The English version, by Mrs Tighe, in six cantos, is simply unreadable

The story of Cupid and Psyché is an allegory, meaning that castles in the air are exquisite till we look at them as realities, when they instantly vanish, and leave only disappointment and vexation behind

Pternoglyphus ("bacon-cooper"), one of the mouse chieftains —Parrell, Battle of the Frogs and Mice, III (about 1712)

Pternophagus ("bacon-eater"), one of the mouse chieftains

But dire Pternophagus divides his way
Through breaking ranks, and leads the dreadful day
No nibbling prince excelled in fierceness more —
His parents fed him on the savage boar
Parrell, Battle of the Frogs and Mice, III, (about 1712).

Pternotiactas ("bacon-gnawer"), father of "the meal-leker," Lycomis (wife of Trovartas, "the bread-eater") Psycarpas, the king of the mice, was son of Lycomis, and grandson of Pternotiactas

—Parrell, Battle of the Frogs and Mice, I. (about 1712)

Ptolemeian System (The) King Alfonso, speaking of this system, said, if he had been consulted at the creation of the world, he would have spared the Maker of it many absurdities

I settle all these things by intuition
Like king Alfonso
I from Milton's Judgment (1819).

Public Good (The League of the), a league between the dukes of Burgundy, Brittany, and other French princes against Louis XI

Publicola, of the Despatch News-paper, was the nom de plume of Mr. Williams, a vigorous political writer

Publius, the surviving son of Horatius after the combat between the three Horatius brothers against the three Curatius of Alba He entertained the Roman notion that "a patriot's soul can feel no ties but duty, and know no voice of kindred" if it conflicts with his country's weal His sister was engaged to Caius Curatius, one of the three Alban champions, and when she reproved him for "murdering" her betrothed, he slay her, for he loved Rome more than he loved friend, sister, brother, or the sacred name of father —Whitchevill, The Roman Father (1711)

Pucel La bel Pucel lived in the tower of "Muske" Grande Amoure, sent thither by fame to be instructed by the seven ladies of science, fell in love with her, and ultimately married her After his death, Remembrance wrote his "epitaphy on his grave"—S Hawes, The Pseudo-tour of Ilesure (1506, printed 1516).

Pucolle (La), a surname given to Joan of Arc the "Maid of Orleans" (1110-1131)

Puck, generally called Hobgoblin. Same as Robin Goodfellow Shakespeare, in Midsummer Night's Dream, represents him as "a very Shetlander among the gossamer-winged, dainty-limbed fairies, strong enough to knock all their heads together, a rough, knurly-limbed, sawn-faced, shock-pated, mischievous little urchin"

He [Oberon] m e eth Puck, which most men call
Hobgoblin, and on him doth fall,
With words from phrency spoken.

"Hob! hob!" quoth Hob. God save your grace
Dryden Amphitruon (1729)

Pudding (Jack), a gourmand, iug clown In French he is called Jean Potage, in Dutch, Pickel-Herringe, in Italian Macaroni, in German John Sausage (Hanswurst)

Puddle-Dock Hill, St Andrew's Hill, Blackfriars, leading down to Puddle Wharf, Ireland Yard

Puff, servant of captain Loveit, and husband of Tag of whom he stands in awe—D Garrick, Miss in Her Teens (1753)

Puff (Mr), a man who had tried his hand on everything to get a living, and at last resorts to criticism He says of himself, "I am a practitioner in panegyric, or to speak more plainly, a professor of the art of puffing"

I open "says Puff with a clock striking to begot an awful attention in the audience It also marks the time which is four o'clock in the morning and gives a description of the rising sun and a great deal about gilding the eastern hemisphere."—Sheridan The Critic 1. 2 (179)

God forbid "says Mr Puff that, in a free country all the fine words in the language should be engrossed by the higher characters of the place —Sir W Scott The Drama

Puff, publisher He says

"Panegyric and praise! and what will that do with the public? Why who will give money to be told that Mr Such-and-one is a wiser and better man than himself? No no! it's quite and clean out of nature. A good souling entire now well powdered with personal pepper and seasoned with the spirit of party that demolishes a conspicuous character and sinks him below our own level,—there there we are pleased there we chuckle and grin and toss the half-crowns on the counter"—Foote The Patron (1764)

Pug, a mischievous little goblin, called "Puck" by Shakespeare—B Jonson, The Devil is an Ass (1616)

Puggie O'rock, a sheriff's officer at Fairport—Sir W Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Pugna Porco'rum (i.e. "battle of the pigs"), a poem, extending to several hundred lines, in which every word begins with the letter p

Pulci (L), poet of Florence (1462–1487), author of the hero-comic poem called Morgante Maggiore, a mixture of the bizarre, the serious, and the comic, in ridicule of the romances of chivalry This Don Juan class of poetry has since been called Bernesque, from Francesco Berni of Tuscany, who greatly excelled in it

Pulci was sire of the half serious rhyme
Who sang when chivalry was more quixotic,
And revelled in the fancies of the time
True knights, chaste dames, huge giants, kings despotic.
Byron Don Juan 17. 6 (1820)

Pulia'no, leader of the Nasamo'ni He was slain by Rinaldo—Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Pumblechook, uncle to Joe Gargery the blacksmith He was a well-to-do corn-chandler, and drove his own chaise-lart A hard-breathing, middle-aged, slow man was uncle Pumblechook, with fishy eyes and sandy hair inquisitively on end He called Pip, in his facetious way, "six-pen'orth of hap-pence," but when Pip came into his fortune, Mr Pumblechook was the most servile of the servile, and ended almost every sentence with, "May I, Mr Pip?" i.e. have the honour of shaking hands with you again—C Dickens, Great Expectations (1860)

Pumpernickel (His Transparency), a nickname by which the Times satirized the minor German princes

Some ninety men and ten drummers constitute their whole embattled host on the parade ground before their palace and their whole revenue is supplied by a percentage on the tax levied on strangers at the Pumpernickel Kursaal—Times July 18 1866

Pumpkin (Sir Gilbert), a country gentleman plagued with a ward (Miss Kitty Sprightly) and a set of servants all stage mad He entertains captain Charles Stanley and captain Harry Stukely at Strawberry Hall, when the former, under cover of acting, makes love to Kitty (an heiress), elopes with her, and marries her

Miss Bridget Pumpkin, sister of Sir Gilbert of Strawberry Hall A Mrs Malaprop She says, "The Greeks, the Romans, and the Irish are barbarian nations who had plays," but Sir Gilbert says, "they were all Jacobites" She speaks of "taking a degree at our principal adversity," asks "if the Muses are a family living at Oxford," if so, she tells captain Stukely, she will be delighted to "see them at Strawberry Hall, with any other of Lis friends" Miss Pumpkin hates "play acting," but does not object to love-making—Jackman, All the World's a Stage

Pun He who would make a pun, would pick a pocket, generally ascribed to Dr Johnson, but has been traced by Moy Thomas to Dr Donne (1573–1631)

* * Dr Johnson lived 1703–1784

Punch, derived from the Latin Mimi, through the Italian Pulcinella It was originally intended as a characteristic representation. The tale is thus Punch, in a fit of jealousy, strangles his infant child, when Judy flies to her revenge. With a bludgeon she belabours her husband, till he becomes so exasperated that he snatches the bludgeon from her, knocks her brains out, and flings the dead body into the street. Here it attracts the notice of a police-officer, who enters the house, and Punch flies to save his life. He is, however, arrested by an officer of the Inquisition, and is shut up in prison, from which he escapes by a golden key. The rest of the allegory shows the triumph of Punch over slander in the shape of a dog, disease in the guise of a doctor, death, and the devil.

Pantalone was a Venetian merchant, Dottore, a Bolognese physician, Spavento, a Neapolitan braggadocio, Pulcinella, a wag of Apulia, Giangarolo and Coviello, two clowns of Calabria, Gelsomino, a Roman beau, Beltame, a Milanese simpleton, Brighella, a Ferrarese pump, and Arlecchino, a blundering servant of Bergamo. Each was clad in an appropriate dress, had a characteristic mask, and spoke the dialect of the place he represented.

Besides these, there were Amorosos or Innamoratos, with their servettes or waiting-maids, as Smeraldina, Colombina, Spilletta, etc., who spoke Tuscan—Walker, On the Revival of the Drama in Italy, 249.

Punch, the periodical. The first cover was designed by A. S. Henning, the present one by R. Doyle.

Pure (Simon), a Pennsylvanian quaker. Being about to visit London to attend the quarterly meeting of his sect, he brings with him a letter of introduction to Obadiah Prim, a rigid, stern quaker, and the guardian of Anne Lovely, an heiress worth £30,000. Colonel Feignwell, availing himself of this letter of introduction, passes himself off as Simon Pure, and gets established as the accepted suitor of the heiress. Presently the real Simon Pure makes his appearance, and is treated as an impostor and swindler. The colonel hastens on the marriage arrangements, and has no sooner completed them, than Master Simon re-appears, with witnesses to prove his identity, but it is too late, and colonel Feignwell freely acknowledges the "bold stroke he has made for a wife"—Mrs. Centlivre, A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717).

Purefoy (Master), former tutor of

Dr. Anthony Rochecliffe the plotting royalist—Sir W. Scott, Woodstock (time—Commonwealth).

Purgatory, by Dante, in thirty-three cantos (1308). Having emerged from hell, Dante saw in the southern hemisphere four stars, "ne'er seen before, save by our first parents." The stars were symbolical of the four cardinal virtues (prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance). Turning round, he observed old Cato, who said that a dame from heaven had sent him to prepare the Tuscan poet for passing through Purgatory. Accordingly, with a slender reed old Cato girded him, and from his face he washed "all sordid stain," restoring to his face "that hue which the dun shades of hell had covered and concealed" (canto 1). Dante then followed his guide Virgil to a huge mountain in mid-ocean antipodal to Judea, and began the ascent. A party of spirits were ferried over at the same time by an angel, amongst whom was Casella, a musician, one of Dante's friends. The mountain, he tells us, is divided into terraces, and terminates in Earthly Paradise, which is separated from it by two rivers—Lethé and Eu'noë (3 syl.). The first eight cantos are occupied by the ascent, and then they come to the gate of Purgatory. This gate is approached by three stairs (faith, penitence, and piety), the first stair is transparent white marble, as clear as crystal, the second is black and cracked, and the third is of blood-red porphyry (canto 10). The porter marked on Dante's forehead seven P's (peccato, "sins"), and told him he would lose one at every stage, till he reached the river which divided Purgatory from Paradise. Virgil continued his guide till they came to Lethé, when he left him during sleep (canto 26). Dante was then dragged through the river Lethé, drank of the waters of Lethe, and met Beatrice, who conducted him till he arrived at the "sphere of unbodied light," when she resigned her office to St. Bernard.

Purgon, one of the doctors in Molière's comedy of Le Malade Imaginaire. When the patient's brother interfered, and sent the apothecary away with his clysters, Dr. Purgon got into a towering rage, and threatened to leave the house and never more to visit it. He then said to the patient, "Que vous tombez dans la brady-pepsie . . . de la brady-pepsie dans la dys-pepsie . . . de la dyspepsie dans l'apapsie de l'apapsie dans la lienterie de la lienterie dans la dysenterie de la dysenterie dans l'hydropisie et l'hydropisie dans la privation de la vie "

Votre M. Purg n, cest un homme tout médecin depuis la tête jusqu'à x pieds un homme qui croit à ses règles plus q, à toutes les démonstrations des mathématiques et qui croirait du crime à les vouloir examiner, qui ne voit rien d'obscur dans la médecine rien du douteux rien de difficile; et qui avec une impétuosité de révélation une roideur de confiance une brutalité de sens commun et de raison donne au travers des purgations et des saignées et ne balance aucune chose — Molière Le Malade Imaginaire III. 3 (1673)

Purita'ni (I), "the puritan," that is Llivi'ra, daughter of Lord Walton also a puritan, affianced to Arturo (Lord Arthur Talbot) a cavalier On the day of espousals, Arturo aids Lariethetta (Henrietta, widow of Charles I) to escape, and Llivi'ra, supposing that he is eloping, loses her reason On his return, Arturo explains the fact to Llivi'ra, and they now nothing on earth shall part them more, when Arturo is arrested for treason, and led off to execution At this crisis, a herald announces the defeat of the Stuarts, and Cromwell pardons all political offenders, whereupon Arturo is released, and marries Llivi'ra — Bellini's opera, I Puritani (1834)

(The libretto of this opera is by C Pepoli)

Purley (Diversions of), a work on the analysis and etymology of English words, by John Horne, the son of a poulterer in London In 1782 he assumed the name of Tooke, from Mr Tooke of Purley, in Surrey, with whom he often stayed, and who left him £8000 (vol 1, 1785, vol 11, 1805)

Purple Island (The), the human body It is the name of a poem in twelve cantos, by Phineas Fletcher
(1633) Canto 1 Introduction Cantos 11-14 An anatomical description of the human body, considered as an island kingdom Canto 15 The "intellectual" man Canto 16 The "natural man," with its affections and lusts Canto 17 The world, the flesh, and the devil, as the enemies of man Cantos 18, 19 The friends of man who enable him to overcome these enemies
Cantos 20, 21 The battle of "Mansoni," the triumph, and the marriage of Eclecta
The whole is supposed to be sung to shepherds by Phirsil a shepherd

Pusillus, Feeble-mindedness personified in The Purple Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633); "a weak, distrustful heart" Fully described in canto viii

(Latin, pusillus, "pusillanimous")

Puss in Boots, from Charles Perrault's tale Le Chat Botte (1697)
Perrault borrowed the tale from the Nights of Straparola an Italian Straparola's Nights were translated into French in 1685, and Perrault's *Contes de
Ieecs* were published in 1697 Ludwig
Tieck, the German novelist, reproduced the same tale in his Volksmarchen (1795), called in German Der Gesticelte Kater
The cat is marvellously accomplished, and by ready wit or ingenious tricks secures a fortune and royal wife for his master, a peasant young miller, who passes under the name of the marquis de Carabris In the Italian tale, puss is called "Constantine's cat"

Putrid Plain (The), the battle-field of Aix, in Provence, where Marius overthrew the Teutons, II c 102

Pwyll's Bag (Prince), a bag that it was impossible to fill.

Come thou in by thyself clad in ragged garments and holding a bag in thy hand and ask nothing but a beggar of food and I will cause that if all the meat and liquor that are in these seven cantiers were put into it it would be no fuller than before — The Mabinogion (Pwyll Prince of Dyfed "twelfth century")

Pygmalion, the statuary of Cyprus
He resolved never to marry, but became enamoured of his own ivory statue, which Venus endowed with life, and the statuary marriage Morris has a poem on the subject in his Earthly Paradise
("August"), and Gilbert a comedy

Fall in love with these
As did Pygmalion with his carved tree
Lord Brooke Treatise on Human Learning (1634 1635)

* * * Lord Brooke calls the statue "a carved tree" There is a vegetable ivory, no doubt, one of the palm species, and there is the ebon tree, the wood of which is black as jet The former could not be known to Pygmalion, but the latter might, as Virgil speaks of it in his Georgics, II 117, "India nigrum fert ebenum" Probably lord Brooke blun-dered from the resemblance between ebor
("ivory") and ebon, in Latin "ebenum"

Pygmy, a dwarf The pygmies were a nation of dwarfs always at war with the cranes of Seythia They were not above a foot high, and lived somewhere at the "end of the earth"—either in Thraee, Ethiopia, India, or the Upper Nile The pygmy women were mothers at the age of three, and old women at eight Their houses were built of egg-shells They cut down a blade of wheat with an axe and hatchet, as we fell huge forest trees

One day, they resolved to attack Hercules in his sleep, and went to work as in a siege. An army attacked each hand, and the archers attacked the feet. Hercules awoke, and with the paw of his lion-skin overwhelmed the whole host, and earned them captive to king Eurystheus.

Swift has availed himself of this Grecian fable in his Gulliver's Travels ("Lilliput," 1726).

Pyke and Pluck (Messrs.), the tools and toadies of sir Mulberry Hawk. They laugh at all his jokes, snub all who attempt to rival their patron, and are ready to swear to anything sir Mulberry wishes to be confirmed.—C. Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Pyllades and Orestes, inseparable friends. Pyllades was a nephew of king Agamemnon, and Orestes was Agamemnon's son. The two cousins contracted a friendship which has become proverbial. Subsequently, Pyllades married Orestes's sister Electra.

Lagrange-Chancel has a French drama entitled Oreste et Pyllade (1695). Voltaire also (Oreste, 1750). The two characters are introduced into a host of plays, Greek, Italian, French, and English. (See ANDROMACHÉ.)

Pyraemon, one of Vulcan's workmen in the smithy of mount Etna. (Greek, pûr amon, "fire anvil.")

Far passing Brochius or Pyraemon great,
The which in Lipari do day and night
Frame thunderbolts for Jove.

Spenser Fairy Queen IV 5 (1546).

Pyramid. According to Diodorus Siculus (Hist., 1), and Pliny (Nat. Hist., XXXVI 12), there were 360,000 men employed for nearly twenty years upon one of the pyramids.

The largest pyramid was built by Cheops or Suphis, the next largest by Cephrenes or Sen-Suphis, and the third by Menchres last king of the fourth Egyptian dynasty, said to have lived before the birth of Abraham.

The Third Pyramid. Another tradition is that the third pyramid was built by Rhodopis or Rhodope, the Greek courtesan. Rhodopis means the "rosy-checked."

The Rhodope that built the pyramid.
Tennyson The Princess II. (1839).

Pyramid of Mexico. This pyramid is said to have been built in the reign of Montezuma emperor of Mexico (1466-1520). Its base is double the size of Cheops's pyramid, that is, 1423 feet each side, but its height does not exceed 161 feet. It stands west of Puebla, faces the four cardinal points, was used as a mausoleum, and is usually called "The Pyramid of Cholula."

Pyr'amos (in Latin Pyrämus), the lover of Thisbe. Supposing Thisbe had been torn to pieces by a lion, Pyramos stabs himself in his unutterable grief "under a mulberry tree." Here Thisbe finds the dead body of her lover, and kills herself for grief on the same spot. Ever since then the juice of this fruit has been blood-stained.—Greek Mythology.

Shakespeare has introduced a burlesque of this pretty love story in his Midsummer Night's Dream, but Ovid has told the tale beautifully.

Pyreni, the Pyrenees.

Who (Henry V.) by his conquering sword should all the land uprise
Which twist the Penmenmaur and the Pyreni lie.
M. Drayton Polyolion IV (1612).

(Penmenmaur, a hill in Caernarvonshire.)

Pyrgo Polinices, an extravagant blusterer. (The word means "tower and town taker").—Plautus, Miles Gloriosus.

If the modern reader knows nothing of Pyrgo Polinices, and Thraso, Pistol and Parolles. If he is that out of the ph ph lo-Coccygia, he may take refuge in Lilliput.—Macaulay.

* * "Thraso," a bully in Terence (The Eunuch), "Pistol," in the Merry Wives of Windsor and 2 Henry IV., "Parolles," in All's Well that Ends Well, "Nephelo-Coccygia" or cloud cuckoo-town, in Aristophanes (The Birds), and "Lilliput," in Swift (Gulliver's Travels).

Pyrocles (3 syl) and his brother Cymocles (3 syl), sons of Aem'iles (incontinence). The two brothers are about to strip sir Guyon, when prince Arthur comes up and slays both of them.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, II 8 (1590).

Pyrocles and Musidorus, heroes, whose exploits are told by sir Philip Sidney in his Arcadia (1581).

Pyr'rho, the founder of the sceptics or Pyrrhonian school of philosophy. He was a native of Elis, in Peloponneseus, and died at the age of 90 (B.C. 285).

It is a pleasant voyage, perhaps to float,
Like Pyrho on a sea of speculation.

Byron Don Juan IX. 18 (1816).

* * "Pyrrhonism" means absolute and unlimited infidelity.

Pythagoras, the Greek philosopher, who is said to have invented the lyre from hearing the sounds produced by a blacksmith hammering iron on his anvil.—See Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, 722.

As great Pythagoras of yore
Standing beside the blacksmith's door,

And hearing the hammers as he smote
The anvils with a different note formed the seven-chorded lyre.

Longfellow To a Child

Handel wrote an "air with variations" which he called The Harmonious Blacksmith, said to have been suggested by the sounds proceeding from a smithy, where he heard the village blacksmiths swinging their heavy sledges "with measured beat and slow."

Pythias, a Syracusan soldier, noted for his friendship for Damon. When Damon was condemned to death by Dionysius the new-made king of Syracuse, Pythias obtained for him a respite of six hours, to go and bid farewell to his wife and child. The condition of this respite was that Pythias should be bound, and even executed, if Damon did not return at the hour appointed. Damon returned in due time, and Dionysius was so struck with this proof of friendship, that he not only pardoned Damon, but even begged to be ranked among his friends. The day of execution was the day that Pythias was to have been married to Calanthe—Damon and Pythias, a drama by R. Edwards (1571), and another by John Brinm in 1825.

Python, a huge serpent engendered from the mud of the deluge, and slain by Apollo. In other words, python is the miasma or mist from the evaporation of the overflow, dried up by the sun (Greek, puthesthai, "to rot," because the serpent was left to rot in the sun).

Q (Old), the earl of March, afterwards duke of Queensberry, at the close of the last century and the beginning of this.

Quacks (Noted)

BECHIC, known for his "cough pills," consisting of digitalis, white oxide of antimony, and liquorice. Sometimes, but erroneously, called "Beecham's magic cough pills."

BOOKER (John), astrologer, etc (1601-1667)

BOSSR (Dr), a German by birth. He was well known in the beginning of the nineteenth century in Covent Garden, and in other parts of London.

BRODTH (eighteenth century). His "nervous cordial" consisted of gentian root infused in gin. Subsequently, a little bart was added.

CAGLIOSTRO, the prince of quacks. His proper name was Joseph Balsamo, and his father was Pietro Balsamo of Palermo. He married Lorenza, the daughter of a girdle-maker of Rome, called himself the count Alessandro di Cagliostro, and his wife the countess Seraphina di Cagliostro. He professed to heal every disease, to abolish wrinkles, to predict future events, and was a great mesmerist. He styled himself "Grand Cophta, Prophet, and Thaumaturge." His "Egyptian pills" sold largely at 80s a box (1743-1795). One of the famous novels of A. Dumas is Joseph Balsamo (1845).

He had a flat snub face, dew-lapped flat nosed greasy and sensual. A forehead impudent, and two eyes which turned up most scrappily languishing. It was a model face for a quack.—Carlyle, Life of Cagliostro

CASE (Dr John), of Lime Regis, Dorsetshire. His name was Latinized into Cuseus, and hence he was sometimes called Dr Cheese. He was born in the reign of Charles II, and died in that of Anne. Dr Case was the author of the Angelic Guide, a kind of Zadriel's Almanac, and over his door was this couplet:

Within this place
Lives Dr Case

Legions of quacks shall join us in this place,
From great hailstones down to Dr Case.

Garth, Dispensary III (1699)

CLARKE, noted for his "world-famed blood-mixture" (end of the nineteenth century).

COCKLE (James), known for his anti-bilious pills, advertised as "the oldest patent medicine" (nineteenth century).

FRANKS (Dr Timothy), who lived in Old Bailey, was the rival of Dr Roek. Franks was a very tall man, while his rival was short and stout (1692-1763).

* * The "Ralph" referred to is Ralph Montagu, son of Edward Montagu, created Viscount in 1682, and duke of Montagu in 1705 (died 1709).

ROCK (Dr Richard) professed to cure every disease, at any stage thereof. According to his bills, "Be your disorder never so far gone, I can cure you." He was short in stature and fat, always wore a white three-tailed wig, nicely combed and frizzed upon each cheek, carried a cane, and waddled in his gait (eighteenth century).

Dr ROCK P.U. never wore a hat. He is usually drawn at the top of his own bills sitting in an armchair holding a little bottle between his finger and thumb and surrounded with rotten teeth, nippers, pills, and quillpots—Goldsmith A Citizen of the World (1729).

SMITH (Dr), who went about the country in the eighteenth century in his coach with four outriders. He dressed in black velvet, and cured any disease for sixpence. "His amusements on the stage were well worth the sixpence which he charged for his box of pills."

As I was sitting at the George Inn I saw a coach with six lay horses, a calash and four a chaise and four a ester the two in yellow livery turned up with red, and four gentlemen on horseback in blue trimmings with silver. As yellow is the colour given by the dukes in England I went out to see what duke it was, but there was no coroner on the coach only a plain coat-of-arms with the motto ARCTO LABORAT FASER [Smith works for money]—Upon inquiry I found this grand equipage belonged to a mountebank named Smith—A Tour Through England (1722).

SOLOMON (Dr), eighteenth century.

His "anti-impetigines" was simply a solution of bichloride of mercury coloured

TAYLOR (Dr Chevalier John) He called himself "Ophthalminator, Pontifical, Imperial, and Royal" It is said that five of his horses were blind from experiments tried by him on their eyes (died 1767)

* * Hogarth has introduced Dr Taylor in his "Undertakers Arms" He is one of the three figures at the top, to the left hand of the spectator

UNBORN DOCTOR (The), of Moorfields Not being born a doctor, he called himself "The Un-born Doctor"

WALKER (Dr), one of the three great quacks of the eighteenth century, the others being Dr Roek and Dr Timothy Franks Dr Walker had an abhorrence of quacks, and was for ever cautioning the public not to trust them, but come at once to him, adding, "there is not such another medicine in the world as mine"

Not for himself but for his country he prepares his pill-pot and seals up his precious drops for any country or any town so great is his zeal and philanthropy — Goldsmith A Citizen of the World, lxxviii (1-2)

WARD (Dr), a footman, famous for his "friars' balsam" He was called in to prescribe to George II, and died 1761 Dr Ward had a claret stain on his left cheek, and in Hogarth's famous picture, "The Undertakers Arms," the cheek is marked gules He occupies the right hand side of the spectator, and forms one of the triumvirate, the others being Dr Taylor and Mrs Mapp

Dr Karlus and Dr Tom Saffold are also known names

QUACKLEBEN (Dr Quentin), "the man of medicine," one of the committee at the Spy — Sir W Scott, St Roman's Well (time, George III)

QUADROON Zambo is the issue of an Indian and a Negro, Mulatto, of a Whiteman and a Negress, Terzeron, of a Whiteman and a Mulatto woman, Quadroon, of a Terzeron and a White

QUINNT (Timothy), servant of governor Heartall Timothy is "an odd fish, that loves to swim in troubled waters" He says, "I never laugh at his infirmities good humours, nor frown at his infirmities I always keep a sober, steady phiz, fixed as the gentleman on horseback at Charing Cross, and, in his worst of humours, when all is fire and fagots with him, if I turn round and coolly say, 'Lord, sir, has anything ruffled you?' he'll burst out into an immoderate fit of laughter, and exclaim, 'Curse that inflexible face of thine! Though you never suffer a smile to mantle on it, it is a figure of fun to the rest of the world'" — Cherry, The Soldier's Daughter (1801)

QUAKOR POET (The), Bernard Barton (1781-1849)

QUALE (Mr), a philanthropist, noted for his bald, shining forehead Mrs Jellyby hopes her daughter Caddy will become Quale's wife — Charles Dickens, Bleak House (1853)

QUARIL (Philip), a sort of Robinson Crusoe, who had a chimpanzee for his "man Friday" The story consists of the adventures and sufferings of an English hermit named Philip Quaril (1727)

QUASIMO'DO, a foundling, hideously deformed, but of enormous muscular strength, adopted by archdeacon Frolo He is brought up in the cathedral of Notre Dame de Paris One day, he sees Esmeralda, who had been dancing in the cathedral close, set upon by a mob as a witch, and he conceals her for a time in the church When, at length, the beautiful gipsy girl is gibbeted, Quasimodo disappears mysteriously, but a skeleton corresponding to the deformed figure is found after a time in a hole under the gibbet — Victor Hugo, Notre Dame de Paris (1831)

QUATRO FILZ AYMON (Les), the four sons of the duke of Dordogne (Dordogne) Their names are Rinaldo, Guicciardo, Alardo, and Ricciardetto (i.e. Renaud, Guscard, Alard, and Richard), and their adventures form the subject of an old French romance by Huon de Villeneuve (twelfth century)

Quix'ote (Don), a gaunt country gentleman of La Mancha, about 50 years of age, gentle and disguised, learned and high-minded, with perverted by romance and crazed with ideas of chivalry. He is the hero of a Spanish romance by Cervantes. Don Quixote feels himself called on to become a knight-errant, to defend the oppressed and succour the injured. He engages for his squire Sancho Panza, a middle-aged, ignorant rustic, selfish but full of good sense, a gourmand but attached to his master, shrewd but credulous. The knight goes forth on his adventures, thinks wind-mills to be giants, flocks of sheep to be armies, mns to be castles, and galley-slaves oppressed gentlemen, but the squire sees them in their true light. Ultimately, the knight is restored to his right mind, and dies like a peaceful Christian. The object of this romance was to laugh down the romances of chivalry of the Middle Ages.

(Quixote means "armour for the thighs," but Quixada means "lantern jaws." Don Quixote's favourite author was Feliciano de Silva, his model knight was Amadis de Gaul. The romance is in two parts, of four books each. Pt I was published in 1605, and pt. II in 1615.)

The prototype of the knight was the duke of Lerma.

Don Quixote is a tall, meagre, lantern-jawed, hawk-nosed, long-limbed, grizzle-haired man with a pair of large black whiskers and he styles him self "The knight of the Woeful Countenance."—Cervantes Don Quixote II i 14 (1615).

Massinger A New Way to Pay Old Debts iv 2 (1629).

Rab'agas, an advocate and editor of a journal called the Carmagnole. At the same office was published another radical paper, called the Crapaud Volant. Rab'agas lived in the kingdom of Monaco, and was a demagogue leader of the deepest red, but was won over to the king's party by the tact of an American lady, who got him an invitation to dine at the palace, and made him chief minister of state. From this moment he became the most strenuous opponent of the "liberal" party.—M. Sardou, Rabagas (1872).

Rabbi Abion of Tient, a fictitious sage and most wonderful linguist. "He knew the nature of all manner of herbs, beasts, and minerals."—Reynard the Fox, vii (1498).

Rabbits. Those rabbits have more nature in them than you commonly find in rabbits, i.e. my production is better than the production of other men. This was said by a conceited artist—J. Foster, Life of Dickens, ii 367.

Rabelais (The English). Dean Swift was so called by Voltaire (1667-1745).

Sterne (1713-1768) and Thomas Amory (1699-1788) have also been so called.

Rabelais (The Modern), William Maginn (1794-1842).

Rabelais of Germany, J Fischart, called "Mentzer" (1550-1611) -

Rabelais's Poison. Rabelais, being at a great distance from Paris, and without money to pay his hotel bill or his fare, made up three small packets of brick-dust. One he labelled "Poison for the king," another "Poison for monsieur," and the third "Poison for the dauphin." The landlord instantly informed against this "poisoner," and the secretary of state removed him at once to Paris. When, however, the joke was found out, it ended only in a laugh — Spectator ("Art of Growing Rich")

Rab'ican or Rabica'no, the horse of Astolpho. Its sire was Wind and its dam Fire. It fed on human food. The word means "short tail" — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

* * Argalia's horse is called by the same name in Orlando Innamorato (1495)

Rabisson, a vagabond tinker and knife-grinder. He was the only person who knew about "the gold-mine" left to the "miller of Grenoble." Rabisson was murdered for his secret by Eusebe Noel the schoolmaster of Bout des Monde — E. Stirling, The Gold-Mine or Miller of Grenoble (1854)

Rab'sheka (in the Bible RAB-SHAKEH), in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for sir Thomas Player (2 Kings viii)

Next him let railing Rab'sheka have place—
So full of zeal he has no need of grace.

PL. II. (165)

Raby (Aurora), a rich young English orphan, catholic in religion, of virgin modesty, "a rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded." She was staying in the house of lord and lady Amundevillo during the parliamentary vacation. Hero don Juan, "as Russian envoy," was also a guest, with several others. Aurora Raby is introduced in canto xv, and crops up here and there in the two remaining cantos, but, as the tale was never finished, it is not possible to divine what part the beautiful and innocent girl was designed by the poet to play. Probably don Juan, having sown his "wild oats," might become a not-unfit match for the beautiful orphan — Byron, Don Juan (1824)

Raby (The Rose of), the mother of Richard III. She was Cecily, daughter of Ralph Nevill de Raby—first earl of Westmoreland. Her husband was Richard duke of York, who was slain at the battle of Wakefield in 1460. She died 1495

Rachael, a servant-girl at lady Peveril's of the Peak — Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

Ra'chael (2 syl), one of the "hands" in Bounderby's mill at Coketown. She loved Stephen Blackpool, and was greatly beloved by him in return, but Stephen was married to a worthless drunkard. After the death of Stephen, Rachael watched over the good-for-nothing young widow, and befriended her — C. Dickens, Hard Times (1854)

Racine of Italy (The), Metastasio (1698-1782).

Racine of Music (The), Antonio Gaspare Sacchini of Naples (1735-1786)

Racket (Sir Charles), a young man of fashion, who has married the daughter of a wealthy London merchant. In the third week of the honeymoon, sir Charles paid his father-in-law a visit, and quarrelled with his bride about a game of whist. The lady affirmed that sir Charles ought to have played a diamond instead of a club. Sir Charles grew furious, and resolved upon a divorce, but the quarrel was adjusted, and sir Charles ends by saying, "You may be as wrong as you please, but I'll be cursed if I ever endeavour to set you right again."

Lady Racket, wife of sir Charles, and elder daughter of Mr Drugget — Murphy, Three Weeks after Marriage (1776)

Racket (Widow), a sprightly, good-natured widow and woman of fashion

A coquette, a wit, and a fine lady — Mrs. Cowley, The Belle's Stratagem, II. 1 (1780)

The Widow Racket was one of Mrs. Pope's best parts. Her usual manner of expressing pliant carelessness consisted in tossing her head from right to left, and striking the palm of one hand with the back of the other [1740-1797] — James Smith.

Rackrent (Sir Condy), in Miss Edgeworth's novel of Castle Rackrent (1802)

Raddle (Mrs), keeper of the lodgings occupied by Bob Sawyer. The young medical practitioner invited Mr Pickwick and his three friends to a convivial meeting, but the termagant Mrs Raddle brought the meeting to an untimely end — C. Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Rad'egonde (St) or St RADIGONDE, queen of France (born 519, died 587). She was the daughter of Bertaire king of dragged forth, and the Moor said, "And how would you act if our lots were reversed?" Ramiro replied, "I would feast you well, and send for my chief princes and counsellors, and set you before them, and bid you blow your horn till you died. "Then be it so," said the Moor. But when Ramiro blew his horn, his "merry men" rushed into the castle, and the Moorish king, with Aldonza and all their children, princes, and counsellors, were put to the sword — Southey, Ramiro (a ballad from the Portuguese, 1804)

Randal, the boatman at Lochleven Castle — Sir W. Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth)

Randolph (Lord), a Scotch nobleman, whose life was saved by young Norval. For this service his lordship gave the youth a commission, but Glenalvon the heir-presumptive hated the new favourite, and persuaded lord Randolph that Norval was too familiar with his lady. Accordingly, Glenalvon and lord Randolph waylaid the lad, who being attacked slew Glenalvon in self-defence, but was himself slain by lord Randolph. When the lad was killed, lord Randolph learned that "Norval" was the son of lady Randolph by lord Douglas her former husband. He was greatly vexed, and went to the war then raging between Scotland and Denmark, to drown his sorrow by activity and danger.

Lady Randolph, daughter of sir Malcolm, was privately married to lord Douglas, and when her first boy was born she hid him in a basket, because there was a family feud between Malcolm and Douglas. Soon after this, Douglas was slain in battle, and the widow married lord Randolph. The babe was found by old Norval a shepherd, who brought it up as his own son. When 18 years old, the lad saved the life of lord Randolph, and was given a commission in the army. Lady Randolph, hearing of the incident, discovered that young Norval was her own son Douglas Glenalvon, who hated the new favourite, persuaded lord Randolph that the young man was too familiar with lady Randolph, and being waylaid, a fight ensued, in which Norval slew Glenalvon, but was himself slain by lord Randolph. Lord Randolph, being informed that the young man was lady Randolph's son, went to the wars to "drive away care," and lady Randolph, in her distraction, cast herself headlong from a steep precipice — J. Home, Douglas (1757)

The voice of Mrs Crawford [1734-1801], when thrown out by the vehemence of strong feeling, seemed to wither up the hearer. It was a flaming arrow, a lightning of passion. Such was the effect of her almost shriek to old Norval. "Was he alive?" It was like an electric shock, which drove the blood back to the heart, and produced a shudder of terror through the crowded theatre — Boden Life of Kemble

Random, a man of fortune with a scapegrace son. He is pale and puffy, with gout and a tearing cough. Random goes to France to recruit his health, and on his return to England gets arrested for debt by mistake for his son. He raves and rages, threatens and vows vengeance, but finds his son on the point of marrying a daughter of sir David Dunder of Dunder Hall, and forgets his evils in contemplation of this most desirable alliance — G. Colman, Ways and Means (1788)

Random (Roderick), a young Scotch scapegrace in quest of fortune. At one time he revels in prosperity, at another he is in utter destitution. Roderick is led into different countries (whose peculiarities are described), and falls into the society of wits, sharpers, courtiers, and harlots. Occasionally lavish, he is essentially mean, with a dash of humour, he is contemptibly revengeful, and, though generous-minded when the whim jumps with his wishes, he is thoroughly selfish. His treatment of Strap is revolting to a generous mind. Strap lends him money in his necessity, but the heartless Roderick wastes the loan, treats Strap as a mere servant, fleeces him at dice, and cuffs him when the game is adverse — T. Smollett, Roderick Random (1748)

Ranger, the madcap cousin of Clarinda, and the leading character in Hooley's Suspicious Husband (1747)

Ran'tipole (3 syl), a madcap One of the nicknames given to Napoleon III (See NAPOLEON III)

Raphael's Enchanter, Giulia Fornarina, a baker's wife Her likeness appears in several of his paintings (See LOVERS)

Rapier (The) was introduced by Rowland York in 1587

The [Rapier and Fork] was a Londoner famous among the clowns in his time for bringing in a new kind of dish—to run the point of a rapier into a man's body before that time the use was with little bucklers and with broadswords to strike and never thrust, and it was accounted mainly to stir the under the girdle.—Carleton, 2 Twenty 1 Remembrance (1655)

Rare Ben Ben Jonson, the dramatist, was so called by Shakespeare (1574-1637)

Raredrench (Master), apothecary.—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Rascal, worthless, lean A rascal deer is a lean, poor stag Brutus calls money "rascal counters," i. e. contemptible, ignoble

When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready god with all your thunderbolts
Dart him to pieces!

Shakespeare Jullius Caesar act iv sc. 3 (1677)

Rashleigh Osbaldistone, called "the scholar," an hypocritical and accomplished villain, killed by Rob Roy—Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

* * Surely never gentleman was plagued with such a family as Sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone of Osbaldistone Hall (1) Percival, "the set," (2) Thorncliff, "the bully," (3) John, "the gamekeeper," (4) Pichard, "the horse-jockey," (5) Wilfred, "the fool," (6) Rashleigh, "the scholar and knave"

Ras'selas, prince of Abresinia, fourth son of the emperor According to the custom of the country, he was confined in a private paradise, with the rest of the royal family This paradise was in the valley of Ambara, surrounded by high mountains It had only one entrance, which was by a cavern under a rock concealed by woods, and closed by iron gates He escaped with his sister Nekayah and Imlac the poet, and wandered about to find out what condition or rank of life was the most happy After careful investigation, he found no lot without its drawbacks, and resolved to return to the "happy valley"—Dr Johnson, Raselas (1759)

The mad astronomer who imagined that he perceived the regulation of the weather and the distribution of the seasons is an original character in romance and the "happy valley" in which Ras has resided to be died with poetic feeling—Young

Rat. One of the richest provinces of Holland was once inundated by a hole made in the dykes by a single water-rat

Rat without a Tail Witches could assume any animal form, but the tail was ever wanting Thus, a cat without a tail, a rat without a tail, a dog without a tail, were witch forms.—See Macbeth, act i. sc. 8.

Rats (Devoured by) Archbishop Hatto, count Graf, bishop Widerolf of Strasburg, bishop Adolph of Cologne, Freiherr von Güttingen, were all devoured by rats (See HATTO, p 429)

Ratchiffe (James), a notorious thief—Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Ratchiffe (Mr Hubert), a friend of sir Edward Mauley "the Black Dwarf"—Sir W Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anne)

Ratchiffe (Mrs), the widow of "don Carlos" who rescued Sheva at Cadiz from an auto da fe

Charles Ratchiffe, clerk of sir Stephen Bertram, discharged because he had a pretty sister, and sir Stephen had a young son Charles supported his widowed mother and his sister by his earnings. He rescued Sheva, the Jew, from a howling London mob, and was left the heir of the old man's property

Miss [Liza] Ratchiffe, sister of Charles, clandestinely married to Charles Bertram and given £10,000 by the Jew to reconcile sir Stephen Bertram to the alliance. She was handsome, virtuous, and elegant, mild, modest, and gentle—Cumberland, The Jew (1776)

Rath'mor, chief of Clutha (the Clyde), and father of Calthion and Colmar Dunthalmo lord of Teutha "came in his pride against him," and was overcome, whereupon his anger rose, and he went by night with his warriors, and slew Rathmor in his own halls, where his feasts had so often been spread for strangers—Ossian, Calthion and Colmar

Rattlin (Jack), a famous naval character in Smollett's Roderick Random. Tom Bowling is in the same novel (1749)

Rattray (Sir Runnion), of Runnigullion, the duelling friend of sir Mungo Malagrowther—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Raucocant'i, leader of a troupe of singers going to act in Sicily. The whole were captured by Lambro the pirate, and sold in Turkey as slaves

Would not become myself to dwell upon
My own merits, and tho' young I see sir you [don Juan]
I have got a travelled air which shows you one
To whom the opera is by no means new You've heard of Raucocant'i—I'm that man
You was [sic] not last year at the fair of Lugo
But next, when I'm engaged to sing there—do go
Byron, Don Juan 1v 88 (1830)

Raven, emblem of Denmark, and standard of the Danes. Necromantic powers are ascribed to it. Asser says, in his Life of Alfred, If the Danes were destined to gain a victory, "a live crow would appear flying on the middle of the unfurled flag, but if they were doomed to be defeated, the flag would hang down motionless," and thus, he continues, "was often proved to be so"

The raven banner was called Landeyda ("the desolation of the country"), and its device was woven by the daughters of Regner Lodbrok

we have shattered back
The hugest wave from Norceland ever yet
Surged on us and our battle axes broken
The Raven's wing and dumbled the carrion creak
From the gray sea for ever
Tennyson Harold 1v 3 (1870)

Raven (Barnaby's), Grip, a large bird, of most impish disposition. Its usual phrases were "I'm a devil!" "Never say die!" "Polly, put the kettle on!" He also uttered a cluck like cork-drawing, a barking like a dog, and a crowing like a cock. Barnaby Rudge used to carry it about in a basket at his back. The bird drooped while it was in jail with his master, but after Barnaby's reprieve,

It soon recovered its good looks and became as glossy and sleek as ever—but for a whole year it never indulged in any other sound than a grave and decorous creak. One bright summer morning the bird advanced with fantastic steps to the door of the Maypole and then cried I'm a devil! three or four times with extraordinary rapture—and from that time constantly practised and improved himself in the vulgar tongue—C Dickens, Barnaby Rudge 11. (1841)

Ravens of Owain (The) Owain had in his army 300 ravens, who were irresistible. It is thought that these ravens were warriors who bore this device on their shields

A man who caused the birds to fly upon the host
Like the ravens of Owain eager for prey
Bleddyn't Vardd Myrhyrion Archaeology 1. 365

Ravens once White One day, a raven told Apollo that Coro'nis, a Thessalian nymph whom he passionately loved, was faithless. Apollo, in his rage, shot the nymph, but hated the raven, and "bade him prate in white plumes never more"—Ovid, Metam., 11

Ravenspurn, at the mouth of the Humber, where Henry IV landed, in 1399, to depose Richard II. It no longer exists, having been wholly engulfed by the sea, but no record exists of the date of this engulfment Ra'venstone or Ra'benstein, the stone gibbet of Germany. So called from the ravens which perch on it

Do you think
I'll honour you so much as save your throat
From the ravenstone by choking you myself?
Byron Werner II 2 (1822).

Ravenswood (Allan lord of), a decayed Scotch nobleman of the royalist party

Master Edgar Ravenswood, the son of Allan In love with Lucy Ashton, daughter of sir William Ashton lord-keeper of Scotland The lovers plight their troth at the "Mermaid's Fountain," but Lucy is compelled to marry Frank Havston laird of Bucklaw The bride, in a fit of insanity, attempts to murder the bridegroom, and dies in convulsions Bucklaw recovers, and goes abroad Colonel Ashton appoints a hostile meeting with Edgar, but young Ravenswood, on his way to the place appointed, is lost in the quicksands of Kelpies Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy — Sir W Scott, Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III)

* * In Donizetti's opera of Lucia di Lammermoor, Bucklaw dies of the wound inflicted by the bride, and Edgar, heart-broken, comes on the stage and kills himself

The catastrophe in the Bride of Lammermoor where [Edgar] Ravenswood is swallowed up by a quicksand is singularly grand in romance but would be inadmissible in a drama.—Encyc. Brit. Art. Romance.

Rawhead and Bloody-Bones, two bogies or huggars, generally coupled together In some cases the phrase is employed to designate one and the same "shadowy sprite"

Servants awe children by telling them of Raw head and Bloody bones.—Locke.

Rayland (Mrs), the domineering lady of the Old Manor-House, by Charlotte Smith (1749-1806)

Mrs Rayland is a sort of queen Elizabeth in private life.—Sir W Scott.

Razor, a barber who could "think of nothing but poor old England" He was the friend and neighbour of Quid-nunc the upholsterer, who was equally crazy about the political state of the nation, and the affairs of Europe in general —Murphy, The Upholsterer (1758)

Razor (To cut blocks with a) Oliver Goldsmith said of Edward Burke, the statesman

Too deep for his hearers he went on refining
And thought of convincing whilst they thought of dining
The equal to all things to all things unfit
Too nice for a statesman too proud for a wit
For a patriot too cool for a drudge disobedient,
And too fond of the right to pursue the expedient
In short, 'twas his fate unemployed or in place sir
To eat mutation cold and cut blocks with a razor
Pettibation (1774)

The National Razor The guillotine was so called in the first French Revolution

Reason (The Feast of).

Theré St. John mingles with my friendly bowl
The feast of reason and the flow of soul.
Pope Satire I. (Imitations of Horace) 178 (1734)

Reason (The goddess of), in the French Revolution, some say, was the wife of Momoro the printer, but Lamartine says it was Mdlle Maillard, an actress

Chauvette assisted by La s an actor of the Opera had arranged the site of December 29 1793. Mdlle Maillard an actress brilliant with youth and talent played the part of the goddess. She was borne in a palanquin the canopy of which was formed of oak branches Women in white with tri-coloured sashes preceded her Attired with theatrical bust his n Phrygian cap and a blue chlamys over a transparent tunic she was taken to the foot of the altar and seated there Behind her burnt an immense torch symbolizing the flame of philosophy the true light of the world. Chauvette, taking a censor in his hands fell on his knees to the goddess, and offered incense and the whole concluded with dancing and song M de Lamar the Michelet says it was Mdlle Aubray

Rebecca, leader of the Rebeccaïtes, a band of Welsh rioters, who in 1843 made a raid upon toll-gates The captain and his guard disguised themselves in female attire

"* This name arose from a gross perversion of a text of Scripture "And they blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate them" (Gen xiv 60)

Oh you will most audacious Look at him most inquisitive Under lock and key most noble I will not dignified.—S Birch The Adopted Child

Recruiting Officer (The), a comedy by G Farquhar (1709) The "recruiting officer" is sergeant Kite, his superior officer is captain Plume, and the recruit is Sylvia, who assumes the military dress of her brother and the name of Jack Wifal alias Pinch Her father, justice Balance, allows the game to pass the muster, and when the trick is discovered, to prevent scandal, the justice gives her in marriage to the captain

Red Book of Hergest (The), a collection of children's tales in Welsh, so called from the name of the place where it was discovered Each tale is called in Welsh a Mabinogi, and the entire collection is the Mabinogion (from mab, "a child") The tales relate chiefly to Arthur and the early British kings A translation in three vols, with notes, was published by lady Charlotte Guest (1838-49)

Red-Cap (Mother), an old nurse at the Hungerford Stairs—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Red-Cap (Mother) Madame Buffon was so called, because her bonnet was deeply coloured with her own blood in a street fight at the outbreak of the French Revolution—W Melville

Red Cross Knight (The) represents St George the patron saint of England His adventures, which occupy bk 1 of Spenser's Fairy Queen, symbolize the struggles and ultimate victory of holiness over sin (or protestantism over popery) Una comes on a white ass to the court of Gloriana, and craves that one of the knights would undertake to slay the dragon which kept her father and mother prisoners The Red Cross Knight, arrayed in all the armour of God (Lph vi 11-17), undertakes the adventure, and goes, accompanied for a time with Una, but, deluded by Archimago, he quits the lady, and the two meet with numerous adventures At last, the knight, having slain the dragon, marries Una, and thus holiness is allied to the Oneness of Truth (1590)

Red Flag (A) signified war in the Roman empire, and when displayed on the capitol it was a call for assembling the military for active service

Red Hair Judas was represented in ancient paintings with red hair and red beard

Red Hand of Ulster

Calverley of Calverley, Yorkshire Walter Calverley, Esq, in 1605, murdered two of his children, and attempted to murder his wife and a child "at nurse" This became the subject of The Yorkshire Tragedy In consequence of these murders, the family is required to wear "the bloody hand"

The Holt family, of Lancashire, has a similar tradition connected with their coat armour.

Red Horse (Tale of the), in Warwickshire, so called from a horse cut in a hill of reddish soil, "a witness of that day we won upon the Danes"

White horse is exalted to the skies
But Red horse of you all contemned only lies Drayton Polyolion, xiii. (1613)

Red Knight (The), sir Permonon's, one of the four brothers who kept the passages leading to Castle Perilous. In the allegory of Gareth, this knight represents noon, and was the third brother. Night, the eldest born, was slain by sir Gareth, the Green Knight, which represents the young day-spring, was overcome, but not slain, and the Red Knight, being overcome, was spared also. The reason is this darkness is slain, but dawn is only overcome by the stronger light of noon, and noon decays into the evening twilight. Tennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, calls sir Permonon "Meridies" or "Noonday Sun." The Latin name is not consistent with a British tale.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i. 129 (1470), Tennyson, Idylls.

Red Knight of the Red Lands (The), sir Ironside. "He had the strength of seven men, and every day his strength went on increasing till noon." This knight kept the lady Iones captive in Castle Perilous. In the allegory of sir Gareth, sir Ironside represents death, and the captive lady "the Bride" or Church triumphant. Sir Gareth combats with Night, Morn, Noon, and Evening, or fights the fight of faith, and then overcomes the last enemy, which is death, when he marries the lady or is received into the Church, which is "the Lamb's Bride." Tennyson, in his Gareth and Lynette, makes the combat with the Red Knight ("Mors" or "Death") to be a single stroke, but the History says that it endured from morn to noon, and from noon to night—in fact, that man's whole life is a contest with moral and physical death.—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur, i. 134-137 (1470), Tennyson, Idylls ("Gareth and Lynette").

Red Land (The). Westphalia was so called by the members of the Vehmengent.

Originally none but an inhabitant of the Red Land could be admitted a member of the Wescene (or were Wescene)—Chambers Prose, iv. 281.

Red-Lattice Phrases, ale-house talk. Red lattices or chequers were ordinary ale-house signs.—Shakespeare,

Merry Wives of Windsor, act ii. sc. 4 (1596)

The chequers were the arms of Fitzwarren, the head of which house in the days of the Henrys was invested with the power of licensing the establishments of victuallers and publicans. Houses licensed notified the same by displaying the Fitzwarren arms.—Times, April 29, 1869.

Red Pipe. The Great Spirit long ago called the Indians together, and, standing on the red pipe-stone rock, broke off a piece, which he made into a pipe, and smoked, letting the smoke exhale to the four quarters. He then told the Indians that the red pipe-stone was their flesh, and they must use the red pipe when they made peace, and that when they smoked it the war-club and scalping-knife must not be touched. Having so spoken, the Great Spirit was received up into the clouds.—American-Indian Mythology.

The red pipe has blown its fumes of peace and war to the remotest corners of the continent. It visited every warrior and passed through its reddened stem the terrible oath of war and desolation. Here too the peace-breathing calumet was born and fringed with eagle's quills, which has shed its thrilling fumes over the land and soothed the fury of the restless savage.—Quill Letters on the North American, ii. 150.

Red Riding-Hood (Little), a child with a red cloak, who goes to carry calce to her grandmother. A wolf placed itself in the grandmother's bed, and when the child remarked upon the size of its eyes, ears, and nose, replied it was the better to see, hear, and smell the little grandchild. "But, grandmamma," said the child, "what a great mouth you have got!" "The better to eat you up," was the reply, and the child was devoured by the wolf.

This nursery tale is, with slight variations, common to Sweden, Germany, and France. In Charles Perrault's Contes des Femmes (1697) it is called "Le Petit Chaperon Rouge."

Red Sea (The). So called by the Greeks and Romans. Perhaps because it was the sea of Edom ("the red man"), perhaps because the shore is a red sand, perhaps because the waters are reddened by red sea-weeds or a red bottom. The Hebrews called it "The Weedy Sea" (Yam-Suph).

The Red Sea is not more red than any other sea, but in some places there is the grave's red, and therefore is called the Red Sea.—Manderly Travels (1492).

Red Swan (The). Odjibwa, hearing a strange noise, saw in the lake a most beautiful red swan. Pulling his bow, he took deliberate aim, without effect. He shot every arrow from his quiver with the same result, then, fetching from his father's medicine sack three poisoned arrows, he shot them also at the bird. The last of the three arrows passed through the swan's neck, whereupon the bird rose into the air, and sailed away towards the setting sun—Schoolcraft, Algonic Researches, ii 9 (1839)

Redgauntlet, a story, told in a series of letters, about a conspiracy formed by sir Edward Hugh Redgauntlet, on behalf of the "Young Pretender" Charles Edward, then above 40 years of age. The conspirators insist that the prince should dismiss his mistress, Miss Walkingshaw, and, as he refuses to comply with this demand, they abandon their enterprise. Just as a brig is prepared for the prince's departure from the island, colonel Campbell arrives with the military. He connives, however, at the affair, the conspirators disperse, the prince embarks, and Redgauntlet becomes the prior of a monastery abroad. This is one of the inferior novels, but is redeemed by the character of Peter Peebles—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (1824)

Redgauntlet embodies a great deal of Scott's own personal history and experience—Chambers' English Literature ii 559

Redgauntlet (Sir Alberich), an ancestor of the family

Sir Edward Redgauntlet, son of sir Alberich, killed by his father's horse

Sir Robert Redgauntlet, an old tory, mentioned in Wandering Willie's tale

Sir John Redgauntlet, son and successor of sir Robert, mentioned in Wandering Willie's tale

Sir Redwald Redgauntlet, son of sir John

Sir Henry Darsie Redgauntlet, son of sir Redwald

Lady Henry Darsie Redgauntlet, wife of sir Henry Darsie

Sir Arthur Darsie Redgauntlet, alias Darsie Latimer, son of sir Henry and lady Darsie

Miss Ithas Redgauntlet, alias Greenmantle, sister of sir Arthur. She marries Allan Fairford

Sir Edward Hugh Redgauntlet, the Jacobite conspirator. He is uncle to Darsie Latimer, and is called "Laird of the Lochs," alias "Mr Hernies of Birrenswark," alias "Master Ingoldsby"—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Redi (Francis), an Italian physician and lyric poet. He was first physician to the grand-duke of Tuscany (1626-1698)

Even Redi, tho he chanted
Bacchus in the Tuscan valleys
Never drank the wine he vaunted
In his dithyrambic sallies
Longfellow Drinking Song

Redlaw (Mr), tho "haunted man" He is a professor of chemistry, who bargained with the spirit which haunted him to leave him, on condition of his imparting to others his own idiosyncrasies. From this moment the chemist carried with him the infection of silliness, selfishness, discontent, and ingratitude. On Christmas Day the infection ceased. Redlaw lost his morbid feelings, and all who suffered by his infection, being healed, were restored to love, mirth, benevolence, and gratitude—C Dickens, The Haunted Man (1848)

Redman (Sir Magnus), governor of the town of Berwick (fifteenth century)

He was remarkable for his long red beard, and was therefore called by the English "Magnus Red beard," but by the Scots in derision "Magnus Red mane" as if his beard had been a horse mane—Godscroft, 178

Redmond O'Neale, Rokeby's father, beloved by Rokeby's daughter Matilda, whom he marries. He turns out to be Northam's son and heir—Sir W Scott, Rokeby (1812)

Reece (Captain), R N, of the Mantelpiece, adored by all his crew. They had feather-beds, warm slippers, hot-water cans, brown Windsor soap, and a valet to every four, for captain Reece said, "It is my duty to make my men happy, and I will." Captain Reece had a daughter, ten female cousins, a niece, and a ma, six sisters, and an aunt or two, and, at the suggestion of William Lee the coxswain, married these ladies to his crew—"It is my duty to make my men happy, and I will." Last of all captain Reece married the widowed mother of his coxswain, and they were all married on one day—"It was their duty, and they did it"—W S Gilbert, The Bab Ballads ("Captain Reece, R N")

Reeve's Tale (The) Symond Symlyn, a miller of Trompington, near Cambridge, used to serve "Soler Hall College," but was an arrant thief. Two scholars, Aleyn and John, undertook to see that a sack of corn sent to be ground was not tampered with, so one stood by the hopper, and one by the trough which received the flour. In the mean time, the miller let their horse loose, and, when the young men went to catch it, purloined half a bushel of the flour, substituting meal instead. It was so late before the horse could be caught, that the miller offered the two scholars a "shakedown" in his own chamber, but when they were in bed he began to belabor them numerically. A scuffle ensued, in which the miller, being tripped up, fell upon his wife. His wife, roused from her sleep, seized a stick, and mistaking the bald pate of her husband for the night-cap of one of the young men, banged it so lustily that the man was almost stunned with the blows. In the morn time, the two scholars made off without payment, taking with them the stick and also the half-bushel of flour which had been made into cakes—Chaucer, Canterbury Tales (1388)

 Boccaccio has a similar story in his Decameron. It is also the subject of a fabliau entitled De Gombert et des Deux Clercs. Chaucer borrowed his story from a fabliau given by Thomas Wright in his Arceota Literaria, 15

Reformado Captain, an officer shelved or degraded because his troops have been greatly reduced

Reformation (The) It was noticed in the earl Lollards, and was radiant in the works of Wycliffe

It was present in the pulpit of Pierre de Bruys, in the pages of Arnolfo di Breseia, in the cell of Roger Bacon

It was active in the field with Peter Revel, in the castle of lord Cobham, in the pulpit with John Huss, in the camp with John Ziska, in the class-room of Pico di Mirandola, in the observatory of Abraham Zacuto, and the college of Antonio di Lebrija, before father Martin was born

Reg'an, second daughter of king Lear, and wife of the duke of Cornwall. Having received the half of her father's kingdom under profession of unbounded love, she refused to entertain him with his suite. On the death of her husband, she designed to marry Edmund natural son of the earl of Gloster, and was poisoned by her elder sister Goneril out of jealousy. Pegan, like Goneril, is proverbial for "filial ingratitude"—Shakespeare, King Lear (1605)

Regent Diamond (The) So called from the regent duke of Orleans. This diamond, the property of France, at first set in the crown, and then in the sword of state, was purchased in India by a governor of Madras, of whom the regent bought it for £60,000

Regillus (The Battle of the Lake)

Regillus Laens is about twenty miles east of Rome, between Genui (north) and Lavium (south). The Romans had expelled Tarquin the Proud from the throne, because of the most scandalous conduct of his son Sextus, who had violated Lueretia and abused her hospitality. Thirty combined cities of Latium, with Sabines and Volseians, took the part of Tarquin, and marched towards Rome. The Romans met the allied army at the lake Regillus, and here, on July 15, B.C. 499, they won the great battle which confirmed their republican constitution, and in which Tarquin, with his sons Sextus and Titus, was slain. While victory was still doubtful, Castor and Pollux, on their white horses, appeared to the Roman dictator, and fought for the Romans. The victory was complete, and ever after the Romans observed the anniversary of this battle with a grand procession and sacrifice. The procession started from the temple of Mars outside the city walls, entered by the Porta Capena, traversed the chief streets of Rome, marched past the temple of Vesta in the forum, and then to the opposite side of the great "square," where they had built a temple to Castor and Pollux in gratitude for the aid rendered by them in this battle. Here offerings were made, and sacrifice was offered to the Great Twin-Brothers, the sons of Ieda. Macaulay has a lay, called The Battle of the Lake Regillus, on the subject.

Where by the lake Regilla
Under the Jorian height
All in the land of Tusculum
Was fought the glorious fight,
Macaulay Lays of Ancient Rome (1849)

A very parallel case occurs in the life of Mahomet. The koreislutes had tried to put down "the prophet," but Mahomet met them in arms, and on January 13, 624, won the famous battle of Bedr. In the Koran (ch. iii), he tells us that the angel Gabriel, on his horse Haizum, appeared on the field with 3000 "angels," and won the battle for him.

In the conquest of Mexico, we are told that St. James appeared on his grey horse at the head of the Castilian adventurers, and led them on to victory. Bernal Diaz, who was in the battle, saw the grey horse, but fancied the rider was Francesco de Morin, though, he confesses, "it might be the glorious apostle St. James" for aught he knew.

Regno (The), Naples

Are our wisest heads leaning towards an alliance with the poet and the Regno?—George Eliot (Marian Evans)

Reg'ulus, a Roman general who conquered the Carthaginians (B.C. 256), and compelled them to sue for peace.
While negotiations were going on, the Carthaginians, joined by Xanthippos the Lacedemonian, attacked the Romans at Tunis, and beat them, taking Regulus prisoner. In 250, the captive was sent to Rome to make terms of peace and demand exchange of prisoners, but he used all his influence with the senate to dissuade them from coming to terms with their foe. On his return to captivity, the Carthaginians cut off his eyelashes and exposed him to the burning sun, then placed him in a barrel armed with nails, which was rolled up and down a hill till the man was dead.

* * This subject has furnished Pradon and Dornet with tragedies (French), and Metastasio the Italian poet with an opera called Regolo (1740). "Regulus" was a favourite part of the French actor François J Talma.

Rehearsal (The), a farce by George Villiers duke of Buckingham (1671). It was designed for a satire on the rhyming plays of the time. The chief character,
Bayes (1 syl), is meant for Dryden.

The name of George Villiers, duke of Buckingham demands cordial mention by every writer on the stage. He lived in an age when plays were chiefly written in rhyme, which served as a vehicle for forming sentiment clouded by hyperbole. The dramas of Lee and Settle are made up of blatant couplets that emphatically thundered through five long acts. To explode an unnatural custom by ridiculing it, was Buckingham's design in The Rehearsal but in doing this the gratification of private dislike was a greater stimulus than the wish to promote the public good.—W. C. Russell Representative Actors

Rejected Addresses, parodies on Wordsworth, Cobbett, Southey, Scott,
Coleridge, Crabbe, Byron, Theodore Hook, etc., by James and Horace Smith, the copyright after the sixteenth edition was purchased by John Murray, in 1819, for £181. The directors of Drury Lane Theatre had offered a premium for the best poetical address to be spoken at the opening of the new building, and the brothers Smith conceived the idea of publishing a number of poems supposed to have been written for the occasion and rejected by the directors (1812).

I do not see why they should have been rejected," said a Leicestershire clergyman, for I think some of them are very good.—James Smith.

Reksh, sir Rustam's horse.

Relapse (The), a comedy by Vanbrugh (1697). Reduced to three acts, and adapted to more modern times by Sheridan, under the title of A Trip to Scarborough (1777).

Rel'dresal, principal secretary for private affairs in the court of Lilliput, and great friend of Gulliver. When it was proposed to put the Man-mountain to death for high treason, Rel'dresal moved, as an amendment, that the "traitor should have both his eyes put out, and be suffered to live that he might serve the nation."— Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

* * Probably the dean had the Bible

Relics (Sacred). The most famous are the following—

CHAL. One of the coats that roasted St. Lawrence.
FACE. The face of a scraph with only part of the nose. (See below Snout.)

FINGER. A finger of St. Andrew, one of John the Baptist, one of the Holy Ghost, and the thumb of St.
Thomas.

HANDKERCHIEFS (Two) with impressions of the face of Christ, one sent by our Lord himself as a present to Achirus prince of Bessa, and the other given to St.
Veronica as the "Man of sorrows" was on his way to execution. The woman had lent it to Jesus to wipe His brow with, and when He returned it an impression of His face was photographed on it.

HEAD. Two heads of John the Baptist.
HEM. The hem of our Lord's garment which the woman with the issue of blood touched, and the hem of Joseph's garment.

LOCK OF HAIR. A lock of the hair with which Mary Magdalene wiped the Saviour's feet.

NAIL. One of the nails used in the Crucifixion set in the iron crown of Lombardy.

PHIAL OF SWEAT. A phial of the sweat of St. Michael when he contended with Satan.

RAIS OF A STAR. Some of the rays of the gilding star which appeared to the Wise Men of the East.

RIB. A rib of the Verbum caro factum, or the Word made flesh.

ROD. Moses' rod.

SEAMLESS COAT. The seamless coat of our Lord, for which lots were cast at the Crucifixion.

SLEPPERS. A pair of slippers worn by Enoch before the Flood.

SNOOT. The snout of a scraph supposed to have belonged to the face (see above).

SPOON. The pop-dish and spoon used by the Virgin Mary for the child Jesus.

SWORD AND SHIELD. The short sword of St. Michael, and his square buckler lined with red velvet.

TEAR. The tear shed by Jesus over the grave of Lazarus. It was given by an angel to Mary Magdalene.

TOOTH. A tooth of our Lord himself.

WATER POT. One of the water pots used at the marriage at Cana in Galilee.

This list is taken from Brady's Classic Calendar, 240 (1855).

It appears by the confessions of the Inquisition that instances of failure have occurred, but the sacred relics have always recovered their virtue when (as Calbert, a monk of Marchiennes informs us) 'they are stogged with rods'—Brady 41.

* * In the Hotel de Cluny, Paris, we are shown a ring which we are assured contains part of one of the thorns of the "crown of thorns"

Reloxa, the clock town (from the Spanish reloz, "a clock")

It would be an excellent joke. Indeed if the natives of a clock were to say every one who only asked them what clock it was—Cervantes' Don Quixote II. II. 8 (1615)

Remember Thou art Mortal!
When a Roman conqueror entered the city in triumph, a slave was placed in the chariot to whisper from time to time into the ear of the conqueror, "Remember thou art a man!"

Vespasian, the Roman emperor, had a slave who said to him daily as he left his chamber, "Remember thou art a man!"

In the ancient Egyptian banquets it was customary during the feast to draw a mummy in a cart round the banquet hall, while one uttered aloud, "To this estate you must come at last!"

When the sultan of Serendib (i.e. Ceylon) went abroad, his vizier cried aloud, "This is the great monarch, the tremendous sultan of the Indies greater than Solima or the grand Miharagê!" An officer behind the monarch then exclaimed, "This monarch, though so great and powerful, must die, must die, must die!"—Arabian Nights ("Sindbad," sixth voyage)

Remois (2 syl.), the people of Rheims, in France

Remond, a shepherd in Britannia's Pastors, by William Browne (1613)

Remond young Remond that full well could sing
And tune his pipe at I am's birth-calling
Who for his nimble leaping, sweetest eyes
A hundred golden notes on holidays
In trampling of whose hand dame Nature swore
There never was his like nor should be more Pastoral 1

Rem'oria, a little fish, which fastens itself on the keel of a ship, and impedes its progress

The ship—Is as insensible of the living as of the dead as the living make it not go the faster so the dead make it not go the slower for the dead are no lilemoris [sic] to alter the course of her passage.—Helps to Memory etc 55 (1639)

A goodly ship with banners bravely dight,
And flax no her top-gallant I espied
All suddenly their clove unto her keel
A little fish that men call I emoria
Which stopp'd her course and held her by the keel,
That what nor tide could move her thence away
Epen'er, Sonnets (1601)

Rem'ores, birds which retard the execution of a project

Remora? oves in anglico dicuntur quæ octurum aliquid amori compellunt.—Festus De Verborum Significatione

Re'naud, one of the paladins of Charlemagne, always described with the properties of a borderer, valiant, alert, ingenious, rapacious, and unscrupulous. Better known in the Italian form Rinaldo (q v)

Renault, a Frenchman, and one of the chief conspirators in which Pierre was concerned. When Jaffier joined the conspiracy, he gave his wife Belvidera as surety of his fidelity, and a dagger to be used against her if he proved unfaithful. Renault attempted the honour of the lady, and Jaffier took her back in order to protect her from such insults. The old villain died on the wheel, and no one pitied him.—T. Otway, Venice Preserved (1682)

René, the old king of Provence, father of queen Margaret of Anjou (wife of Henry VI of England). A minstrel-monarch, friend to the chase and tilt, poetry, and music. Theobault says he gave in largesses to knights-errant and minstrels more than he received in revenue (ch. xix).—Sir W. Scott, Jane of Genstein (time, Edward IV)

René (2 syl.), the hero and title of a romance by Chateaubriand (1801). It was designed for an episode to his Génie du Christianisme (1802). René is a man of social inaction, conscious of possessing a superior genius, but his pride produces in him a morbid bitterness of spirit.

René [LENIANC], notary public of Grand Pré, in Acadia (Nova Scotia). Bent with age, but with long yellow hair flowing over his shoulders. He was the father of twenty children, and had a hundred grandchildren. When Acadia was ceded by the French to England, George II confiscated the goods of the simple colonists, and drove them into exile. René went to Pennsylvania, where he died, and was buried.—Longfellow, Evangeline (1819)

Rentowel (Mr Jabesh), a covenanting preacher.—Sir W. Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

With the vehemence of some pulpit-drumming Gowk—through the Waverley, or "precious" Mr Jabesh Rentowel—Carlyle

Resolute (The), John Florio, philologist He was the tutor of prince Henry (1545-1625)

* * This "Florio" was the prototype of Shakespeare's "Holofernes"

Resolute Doctor (The), John Baconthorp (*-1316)

* * Guillaume Durandus de St Pourcain was called "The Most Resolute Doctor" (1267-1332)

Restless (Sir John), the suspicious husband of a suspicious wife Both are made wretched by their imaginings of the other's infidelity, but neither have the slightest ground for such suspicion

Lady Restless, wife of sir John As she has a fixed idea that her husband is inconstant, she is always asking the servants, "Where is sir John?" "Is sir John returned?" "Which way did sir John go?" "Has sir John received any letters?" "Who has called?" etc., and, whatever the answer, it is to her a confirmation of her surmises —A Murphy, All in the Wrong (1761)

Reuben Dixon, a village school-master of "ragged lads"

Mid noise and dirt and stench and play and prate
He calmly cuts the pen or views the slate.
Cribble Borough xxiv (1810)

Reuben and Seth, servants of Nathan ben Israel, the Jew at Ashby, a friend of Isaac and Rebecca —Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I)

Reullu'ra (i.e. "beautiful star"), the wife of Aodh, one of the Culdees or primitive clergy of Scotland, who preached the gospel of God in Io'na, an island south of Striffa Here Ulfa'gre the Dane landed, and, having put all who opposed him to death, seized Aodh, bound him in iron, carried him to the church, and demanded where the treasures were concealed Just then appeared a mysterious figure all in white, who first unbound Aodh, and then taking the Dane by the arm, led him up to the statue of St Columb, which immediately fell and crushed him to death Then turning to the Norsemen, the same mysterious figure told them to "go back, and take the bones of their chief with them," adding, whoever lifted hand in the island again should be a paralytic for life The "saint" then transported the remnant of the islanders to Ireland, but when search was made for Reullura, her body was in the sea, and her soul in heaven —Campbell, Reullura

Reutha'mir, the principal man of Balelutha a town belonging to the Britons on the river Clyde His daughter Moira married Clessammor (Fingal's uncle on the mother's side) Reutha'mir was killed by Comhal (Fingal's father) when he attacked Balelutha and burned it to the ground —Ossian, Carthon

Rev'eller (Lady), cousin of Valeria the blue-stockings Lady Reveller is very fond of play, but ultimately gives it up, and is united to lord Worthy —Mrs Centlivre, The Basset Table (1706)

Revenge (The), a tragedy by Edward Young (1721) (For the plot, see ZANGA)

Revenge (The), the ship under the command of sir Richard Grenville, anchored at Flores, in the Azores, when a fleet of fifty-three Spanish ships hove in sight Lord Thomas Howard, with six men-of-war, sailed off, but sir Richard stood his ground He had only a hundred men, but with this crew and his one ship he encountered the Spanish fleet The fight was very obstinate Some of the Spanish ships were sunk, and many shattered, but sir Richard at length was wounded, and the surgeon shot while dressing the wound "Sink the ship, master gunner!" cried sir Richard, "sink the ship, and let her not fall into the hands of Spain!" But the crew were obliged to yield, and sir Richard died The Spaniards were amazed at Grenville's pluck, and gave him all honours as they cast his body into the sea The Revenge was then manned by Spaniards, but never reached the Spanish coast, for it was wrecked in a tempest, and went down with all hands aboard —Tennison, The Revenge, a ballad of the fleet (1878)

* * This sea-fight is the subject of one of Froinde's essays

Canon Kingsley has introduced it in Westward Ho! where he gives a description of sir Richard Grenville

Lord Bacon says the fight "was memorable even beyond credit, and to the height of heroic fable"

Mr Arber published three interesting contemporary documents relating to The Revenge, by Sir Walter Raleigh

Gerard Markham wrote a long poem on the subject (two hundred stanzas of eight lines each)

Revenge (The Palace of), a palace of crystal, provided with everything agreeable to life, except the means of going out of it. The fairy Pagan made it, and when Imis rejected his suit because she loved prince Philax, he shut them up in this palace out of revenge. At the end of a few years, Pagan had his revenge, for Philax and Imis longed as eagerly for a separation as they had once done to be united — Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Palace of Revenge," 1682)

Revenons à nos Moutons, let us return to the matter in hand. The phrase comes from an old French comedy of the fifteenth century, entitled L'Avocat Patelin, by Blanchet. A clothier, giving evidence against a shepherd who had stolen some sheep, is for ever running from the subject to talk about some cloth of which Patelin, his lawyer, had defrauded him. The judge from time to time pulls him up, by saying "Well, well! and about the sheep?" "What about the sheep?" (See PATILIN, p. 737)

Revolutionary Songs By far the most popular were

1 La Marseillaise, both words and music by Rouget de Lisle (1792)

2 Veillons au Salut de l'Impie, by Adolphe S. Boy (1791). Music by Dalrymple. Very strange that men whose whole purpose was to destroy the empire, should go about singing, "Let us guard it!"

3 Ca Ira, written to the tune of Le Carillon National, in 1789, while preparations were being made for the Fête de la Fédération. It was a great favourite with Marie Antoinette, who was for ever "strumming the tune on her harpsichord."

4 Chant du Départ, by Marie Joseph de Chénier (1791). Music by Méhul. This was the most popular next to the Marseillaise.

5 La Carmagnole. "Madame Veto avait promis de faire égorger tout Paris" (1792). Probably so called from Carmagnole, in Piedmont. The burden of this dancing song is

Dansons la Carmagnole
Vive le roi! Vive le roi!
Dansons la Carmagnole
Vive le son du canon!

6 Le Vengeur, a cock-and-bull story, in verse, about a ship so called. Lord Howe took six of the French ships, June 1, 1791, but Le Vengeur was sunk by the crew that it might not fall into the hands of the English, and went down while the crew shouted, "Vive la République!" There is as much truth in this story as in David's picture of Napoleon "Crossing the Alps."

In the second Revolution we have

1 La Parisienne, called "The Marseillaise of 1830," by Casimir Delavigne, the same year

2 La Marseillaise à l'Horreur du Sotage, by Casimir Delavigne (1813)

3 La Champ de Bataille, by I. mile Debray (about 1830)

The chief political songs of Béranger are Adieu de Marie Stuart, La Cocarde Blanche, Jacques, La Déesse, Marquis de Carabas, Le Sacre de Charles le Simple, Le Sénateur, Le Vieux Caporal, and Le Vain.

Rewcastle (Old John), a Jedburgh smuggler, and one of the Jacobite conspirators with the laird of Ffleslaw — Sir W. Scott, The Black Dwarf (time, Anne)

Reynaldo, a servant to Polonius — Shakespeare, Hamlet (1596)

Reynard the Fox, the hero of the beast-epic so called. This prose poem is a satire on the state of Germany in the Middle Ages. Reynard represents the Church, Isengrin the wolf (his uncle) typifies the baronial element, and Nodel the lion stands for the regal power. The plot turns on the struggle for supremacy between Reynard and Isengrin. Reynard uses all his endeavours to victimize every one, especially his uncle Isengrin, and generally succeeds — Remuée Fuchs (thier-epos, 1198), by H. von Alkmaar

Reynardine (3 syl.), eldest son of Reynard the fox. He assumed the names of Dr. Pedanto and Crabron — Reynard the Fox, by H. von Alkmaar (1498)

Reynold of Montalbon, one of Charlemagne's paladins

Reynolds (Sir Joshua) is thus described by Goldsmith

Here Reynolds is laid, and to tell you my mind
He has not left a wiser or better behind,
His pencil was striking, restless, and grand,
His manners were gentle, complying, and bland,
To coxcombs aversé, yet most civilly steering
When they judged without skill he was ill hard of
- hearing

When they talked of their Raphaels Corrales [sic] and He bluffed his trumpet and only took snuff
Peculation (1774)

N B —Sir Joshua Reynolds was hard of hearing, and used an ear-trumpet

Rez'io (Dr) or "Pedro Rezio of Ague'ro," the doctor of Barata'ria, who forbade Saneho Panza to taste any of the meats set before him Roast partridge was "forbidden by Hippoc'ratés" Po-dr'ida was "the most pernicious food in the world" Rabbits were "a sharp-haired diet" Veal was "prejudicial to health"
But, he said, the governor might eat "a few wafers, and a thin slice or two of quince"—Cervantes, Don Quixote, II in 10 (1615)

DR SANGRANO seems to be copied in some measure from this character His panacea was hot water and stewed apples
—Lesage, Gil Blas (1715-35)

DR HANCOCK (a real character) prescribed cold water and stewed prunes

Rhadaman'thus, son of Jupiter and Euro'pa He reigned in the Cyclad's with such partiality, that at death he was made one of the judges of the infernal regions

And if departed souls must rise again
And bide the judgment of reward or pain
Then Rhadamanthus and stern Minos were True types of justice while they lived here
Lord Brooke Monarchie I (1651-16 ~)

Rhampsin'tos, king of Egypt, usually called Ram'ess's III, the richest of the Egyptian monarchs, who amassed 72 millions sterling, which he secured in a treasury of stone By an artifice of the builder, he was robbed every night —
Herodotus, II 121

A parallel tale is told of Hyrieus
[Hy'ri'uce] of Hyria His two architects, Trophônios and Agamêdês (brothers), built his treasure-vaults, but left one stone removable at pleasure After great loss of treasure, Hyrieus spread a net, in which Agamêdês was caught To prevent recognition, Trophonios cut off his brother's head —Pausanias, Itinerary of Greece, IV 37, 8

A similar tale is told of the treasurevaults of Aug'as king of Elis

Rha'sis or Mohammed Abonbekr ibn
Zakaria el Razi, a noted Arabian physician He wrote a treatise on small-pox and measles, with some 200 other treatises

Rheims (The Jackdaw of) The cardinal-archbishop of Rheims made a grand feast, to which he invited all the johillies of the neighbourhood There were abbots and prelates, knights and squires, and all who delighted to honour the great panjandrum of Rheims The feast over, water was served, and his lordship's grace, drawing off his turquoise ring, laid it beside his plate, dipped his fingers into the golden bowl, and wiped them on his napkin, but when he looked to put on his ring, it was nowhere to be found
It was evidently gone The floor was searched, the plates and dishes lifted up, the rugs and chaises, every possible and impossible place was poked into, but without avail The ring must have been stolen His grace was furious, and, in dignified indignation, calling for bell, book, and caudle, banned the thief, both body and soul, this life and for ever It was a terrible curse, but none of the guests seemed the worse for it—except, indeed, the jackdaw The poor bird was a pitiable object, his head lobbed down, his wings dragged on the floor, his feathers were all ruffled, and with a ghost of a caw he prayed the company to follow him, when lo! there was the ring, hidden in some sly corner by the jackdaw as a clever practical joke His lordship's grace smiled benignantly, and instantly removed the curse, when lo!
as if by magic, the bird became fat and sleek again, perky and impudent, wagging his tail, winking his eye, and cock-ing his head on one side, then up he hopped to his old place on the cardinal's chair Never after this did he indulge in thievish tricks, but became so devout, so constant at feast and chapel, so well-behaved at matins and vespers, that when he died he died in the odour of sanctity, and was canonized, his name being changed to that of Jim Crow —Barham, Ingoldsb' Legends ("Jackdaw of Rheims," 1837)

Rhene (1 syl), the Rhine, the Latin
Rhe'nis —Milton, Paradise Lost, I 353
(1665)

Rhesus was on his march to aid the Trojans in their siege, and had nearly reached Troy, when he was attacked in the night by Ulysses and Diomed In this surprise Rhesus and all his army were cut to pieces — Homer, Iliad, 2

A very parallel case was that of Sweno the Dane, who was marching to join Godfrey and the crusaders, when he was attacked in the night by Solymann, and both Sweno and his army perished — Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1577)

Rhetoric of a Silver Fee (The)

Rhinoceros-Horn a Poison-Detector If poison is put into a vessel made of a rhinoceros's horn, the liquid contained therein will effervesce

Rhinoceros and Elephant The rhinoceros with its horn gores the elephant under the belly, but blood running into the eyes of the rhinoceros, blinds it, and it becomes an easy prey to the roc — Arabian Nights ("Sindbad's Second Voyage")

Rhodafind, daughter of Aribert king of Lombardy, in love with duke Gondibert, but Gondibert preferred BIRTHA, a country girl, daughter of the sage Astræon. While the duke is whispering sweet love-notes to BIRTHA, a page comes post-haste to announce to him that the king has proclaimed him his heir, and is about to give him his daughter in marriage. The duke gives BIRTHA an emerald ring, and says if he is false to her the emerald will lose its lustre, then hastens to court in obedience to the king's summons. Here the tale breaks off, and was never finished — Sir Wm Davenant, Gondibert (1605-1668)

Rhodian Venus (The) This was the "Venus" of Protagoras mentioned by Pliny, Natural History, XXXV 10

When first the Rhodian mimic art arrayed
The Queen of Beauty in her Cyprian shroud
The happy master mingled in his piece
Each look that charmed him in the fair of Greece
Campbell Treasures of Dope II (1729)

Prior (1664-1721) refers to the same painting in his fable of Protagoras and Apelles

I hope sir you intend to stay
To see our Venus 'tis the place

Rhongomyant, the lance of king Arthur — The Mabonogion ("Killweh and Olwen," twelfth century)

Rhyming to Death In Henry VI act I sc 1, Thomas Beaufort duke of Exeter, speaking about the death of Henry V, says "Must we think that the subtle-witted French conjurers and sorcerers, out of fear of him, 'by magic verses have contrived his end'?" The notion of killing by incantation was at one time very common

Tri hinc will not stick to affirm that they can Rime either man or beast to death. — Reg Scot Discoverie of Illegitimacy (1564)

Ribbon The yellow ribbon, in France, indicates that the wearer has won a médaille militaire (instituted by Napoleon III) as a minor decoration of the Legion of Honour

The red ribbon marks a chevalier of the Legion of Honour. A rosette indicates a higher grade than that of chevalier

Ribemont (3 syl), the bravest and noblest of the French host in the battle of Poitiers. He alone dares confess that the English are a brave people. In the battle he is slain by lord Audley — Shirley, Edward the Black Prince (1640)

Ribemont (Count), in The Siege of Calais, by Colman

Riccard'o, commander of Plymouth fortress, a puritan to whom lord Walton has promised his daughter Elvira in marriage. Riccard'o learns that the lady is in love with Arthur Talbot, and when Arthur is taken prisoner by Cromwell's soldiers, Riccard'o promises to use his efforts to obtain his pardon. This, however, is not needful, for Cromwell, feeling quite secure of his position, orders all the captives of war to be released. Riccard'o is the Italian form of sir Richard Forth — Bellini, I Puritani (opera, 1834)

Ricciardetto, son of Ammon, and brother of Bradamante — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Rice Eating rice with a bodkin Amnê, the beautiful wife of Sidi Nouman, ate rice with a bodkin, but she was a ghoul (See AMNÊ)

Richard (Prince), eldest son of king Henry II — Sir W. Scott, The Betrothed (time, Henry II)

Richard "Cœur de Lion," introduced in two novels by sir W. Scott (The Talisman and Ivanhoe). In the latter he first appears as "The Black Knight," at the tournament, and is called Le Noir Fainéant or "The Black Sluggard," also "The Knight of the Fetter-lock"

Richard a Name of Terror The name of Richard I, like that of Attila, Bonaparte, Corvinus, Narses, Sebastian, Talbot, Tamerlane, and other great conquerors, was at one time employed in terrorem to disobedient children (See NAMES or TERROR, p. 675)

His tremendous name was employed by the Syrian mothers to silence their infants. And if a horse suddenly started from this way his rider was wont to exclaim: "Dost thou think king Richard is in the bush?" — Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire xl. 146 (1776-83)

The Daughters of Richard I When Richard was in France, Fulco a priest told him he ought to beware how he bestowed his daughters in marriage. "I have no daughters," said the king. "Nay, nay," replied Fulco, "all the world knows that you have three—Pride, Covetousness, and Lechery." "If these are my daughters," said the king, "I know well how to bestow them where they will be well cherished. My eldest I give to the Knights Templars, my second to the monks, and my third, I cannot bestow better than on yourself, for I am sure she will never be divorced nor neglected." — Thomas Milles, True Nobility (1610)

The Horse of Richard I, Fennel

Ah Fennel, my noble horse, thou bleedest, thou art slain! — Cœur de Lion and His Horse

The Troubadour of Richard I, Bertrand de Born

Richard II's Horse, Rorn Barbary — Shakespere, Richard II act v. sc. 5 (1597)

Richard III, a tragedy by Shakespere (1597). At one time, parts of Rowe's tragedy of Jane Shore were woven into the acting edition, and John Kemble introduced other clap-traps from Colley Cibber. The best actors of this part were David Garrick (1716-1779), Henry Mossop (1729-1773), and Edmund Kean (1787-1833)

Richard III was only 19 years old at the opening of Shakespere's play — Sharon Turner

The Horse of Richard III, White Surrey — Shakespere, Richard III act v. sc. 3 (1597)

Richard's himself again These words were interpolated by John Kemble from Colley Cibber

Richelieu (Armand), cardinal and chief minister of France. The duke of Orleans (the king's brother), the count de Baradas (the king's favourite), and other noblemen conspired to assassinate Richelieu, dethrone Louis XIII, and make queen is advised to marry again, and Rigdum Funnidos is proposed to her as "a very proper man." At this Aldiborontophoseophornio takes umbrage, and the queen says, "Well, gentlemen, to make matters easy, I'll have you both!" —H Carey, Chrononhotonthologos (1734)

* * John Ballantine, the publisher, was so called by Sir W. Scott. He was "a quick, active, intrepid little fellow, full of fun and merriment, all over quaintness and humorous mimicry."

Right-Hitting Brand, one of the companions of Robin Hood, mentioned by Mundy.

Rig'ollette (3 syl.), a grisette and courtesan —Eugene Sue, Mysteries of Paris (1842-3).

Rigoletto, an opera, describing the agony of a father obliged to witness the prostitution of his own daughter —Verdi, Rigoletto (1852).

* * The libretto of this opera is horrified from Victor Hugo's drama Le Roi s'Amuse.

Rimegap (Joe), one of the miners of Sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak —Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.).

Rimini (Francesca di), a woman of extraordinary beauty, daughter of a signore of Ravenna. She was married to Lanciotto Malatesta, signore of Rimini, a man of great bravery, but deformed. His brother Paolo was extremely handsome, and with him Francesca fell in love. Lanciotto, detecting them in criminal intercourse, killed them both (1389).

This tale forms one of the episodes of Dante's Inferno, is the subject of a tragedy called Francesca di Rimini, by Silvio Pellico (1819), and Leigh Hunt, about the same time, published his Story of Rimini, in verse.

Rimmon, seventh in order of the hierarchy of hell: (1) Satan, (2) Beelzebub, (3) Moloch, (4) Chemos, (5) Thammuz, (6) Dagon, (7) Rimmon, which chief temple was at Damascus (2 Kings v. 18).

Ilm (Dagon) followed Irimmon whose delightful seat was [sic] Damascus on the fertile banks Of Abana and Pharpar, lucid streams Milton Paradise Lost L. 46th etc. (1635)

Rinaldo, son of the fourth marquis d'Esté, cousin of Orlando, and nephew of Charlemagne. He was the rival of Orlando in his love for Angelica, but Angelica detested him. Rinaldo brought an auxiliary force of English and Scotch to Charlemagne, which "Silence" conducted safely into Paris —Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516).

Rinaldo, the Achilles of the Christian army in the siege of Jerusalem. He was the son of Bertoldo and Sophia, but was brought up by Matilda. Rinaldo joined the crusaders at the age of 15. Being summoned to a public trial for the death of Gerando, he went into voluntary exile —Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575).

* * Pulci introduces the same character in his burlesque poem entitled Morgante Maggiorè, which holds up to ridicule the romances of chivalry.

Rinaldo, steward to the countess of Rouillon —Shakespeare, All's Well that Ends Well (1598).

Rinaldo of Montalban, a knight who had the "honour" of being a public plunderer. His great exploit was stealing the golden idol of Mahomet.

In this same Mirror of Knighthood we meet with Rinaldo de Montalban and his companion with the twelve peers of France and Turpin the historian. Rinaldo had a broad face and a pair of large rolling eyes, his complexion was ruddy, and his disposition choleric. He was, besides, naturally profligate, and a great encourager of vagrants —Cervantes Don Quixote I. i. 16 (1605).

Ring (Coreud's), composed of six different metals. It ensured the wearer success in any undertaking in which he chose to embark.

"While you have it on your finger," said the old man, "misfortune shall fly from your house and nobody shall be able to hurt you, but one condition is attached to the gift, which is this: when you have chosen for yourself a wife, you must remain faithful to her as long as she lives. The moment you neglect her for another you will lose the ring." —T. S. Guelette Chinese Tales (Coreud and His Four Sons) 1723.

Ring (Dame Lionés's), a ring given by Dame Lionés to Sir Gareth during a tournament.

"That ring," said Dame Lionés, "increaseth my beauty much more than it is of itself, and this is the virtue of my ring, that which is green it will turn to red, and that which is red it will turn green, that which is blue it will turn white, and that which is white it will turn blue, and so with all other colours. Also whoever beareth my ring, can never lose blood." —Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur L. 146 (1470).

Ring (Fauy). Whoever lives in a house built over a fairy-ring shall wonderfully prosper in every thing —Athenian Oracle, i. 307.

Ring (Luned's). This ring rendered the wearer invisible. Luned or Lynet gave it to Owain, one of King Arthur's knights. Consequently, when men were sent to kill him, he was nowhere to be found, for he was invisible.

"Take this ring," and put it on thy finger, with the stone inside thy hand, and clove thy Land upon the stone, and one of them flew into Libya, and the other into Dodona. The former gave the responses in the temple of Ammon, and the latter in the oracle of Dodona.

And mystic sentence spoke.

Tennyson.

Ringhorse (Sir Robert), a magistrate at Old St Ronan's—Sir W Scott, St Ronan's Well (time, George III.)

Ringwood, a young Templar—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I.)

Rintherout (Jenny), a servant at Monk Barns to Mr Jonathan Oldbuck the antiquary—Sir W Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.)

Riou (Captain), called by Nelson "The Gallant and the Good," fell in the battle of the Baltic.

Brave hearts! to Britain's pride
Once so faithful and so true
On the deck of fame that died
With the gallant good Riou
Campbell Battle of the Baltic (1777-1844)

R. I P., i.e. requiescat in pace

Rip van Winkle slept twenty years in the Catskill Mountains of North America (See WINKLE.)

Epimenides the Gnostic slept for fifty-seven years.

Nourjahad, wife of the Mogul emperor Geangir, who discovered the otto of roses.

Gyneth slept 500 years, by the enchantment of Merlin.

The seven sleepers slept for 250 years in mount Celion.

St David slept for seven years (See ORMANDINE.)

(The following are not dead, but only sleep till the fullness of their respective times—Ehjah, Endymion, Merlin, king Arthur, Charlemagne, Frederiek Barharossa and his knights, the three Tells, Desmond of Kilmallock, Thomas of Breeldoune, Bobadil el Chieu, Brian Boromhe, Knez Lazar, king Sebastian of Portugal, Olaf Tryggvason, the Irench slain in the Sicilian Vespers, and one or two others.)

Riquet with the Tuft, the beautiful of ugliness, but with the power of bestowing wit and intelligence on the person he loved best. Riquet fell in love with a most beautiful woman, as stupid as he was ugly, but possessing the power of giving beauty to the person she loved best. The two married, whereupon Riquet gave his bride wit, and she bestowed on him beauty. This, of course, is an allegory. Love sees through a couleur de rose—Charles Perrault, Contes des Fées ("Riquet à la Houppe," 1697).

* * * This tale is borrowed from the Nights of Straparola. It is imitated by Mde Villeneuve in her Beauty and the Beast.

Risingham (Bertiam), the vassal of Philip of Mortham. Oswald Wycliffe induced him to shoot his lord at Marston Moor, and for this deed the vassal demanded all the gold and movables of his late master. Oswald, being a villain, tried to outwit Bertram, and even to murder him, but it turned out that Philip of Mortham was not killed, neither was Oswald Wycliffe his heir, for Redmond O'Neale (Rokeby's page) was found to be the son and heir of Philip of Mortham—Sir W Scott, Rokeby (1812).

Ritho or Rython, a giant who had made himself furs of the beards of kings killed by him. He sent to king Arthur to meet him on mount Aravius, or else to send his beard to him without delay. Arthur met him, slew him, and took "fur" as a spoil. Dryton says it was this Rython who carried off Helena the niece of duke Hoel, but Geoffrey of Monmouth says that king Arthur, having killed the Spanish giant, told his army "he had found none so great in strength since he killed the giant Ritho," by which it seems that the Spanish giant and Ritho are different persons, although it must be confessed the scope of the chronicle seems to favour their identity.—Geoffrey, British History, x. 3 (1142).

As how great Rython's self he [Arthur] slew
Who ravished Howells' niece young Helena the fair
Dryton Polyglottion iv (1612)

Ritsonism, malignant and insolent criticism. So called from Joseph Ritson (1752-1803).

Ritson's assertion must be regarded as only an example of that peculiar species of malignant and brutal insolence in criticism which ought from him to be deominated Ritsoism—R. Southey.

Rival Queens (The), Satira and Roxana. Statira was the daughter of Darius, and wife of Alexander the Great. Roxana was the daughter of Oxyartes the Bactrian, her, also, Alexander married. Roxana stabbed Statira and killed her—N. Lee, Alexander the Great or The Rival Queens (1678).

Rivals (The), a comedy by Sheridan (1775). The rivals are Bob Acres and removed, and Frank then marries Diana Vernon—Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Father beneath the middle size than above it, his limbs were formed upon the very strongest model that is consistent with agility. Two points in his person interfered with the rules of symmetry: his shoulders were too broad, and his arms (though round, shewy and strong) were so very long as to be rather a deformity.—Ch. xxiii.

Robb Tally-ho, Esq, cousin of the Hon Tom Dashiell, the two blades whose rambles and adventures through the metropolis are related by Pierce Egan (1821-2)

Robb the Rambler, the comrade of Willie Steenson the blind fiddler—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Robb (Duncan), the grocer near Ellangowan—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II),

Robber (Alexander's) The pirate who told Alexander he was the greater robber of the two, was Diomedes (See Living's at Home, art "Alexander and the Robber") The tale is from Cicero (See Gesta Romanorum, c. lvi)

Nam quom quæretur ex eo quo scelere impulsus malo laberet infestum uno inoparone eodem inquit, quo tu orbem terre—De Repub lib. 14 sec. 24

Robber (Edward the) Edward IV was so called by the Scotch

Robert, father of Marian He had been a wrecker, and still hankered after the old occupation One night, a storm arose, and Robert went to the coast to see what would fall into his hands A body was washed ashore, and he rifled it Marian followed, with the hope of restraining her father, and saw in the dusk some one strike a dagger into a prostrate body She thought it was her father, and when Robert was on his trial, he was condemned to death on his daughter's evidence Black Norris, the real murderer, told her he would save her father if she would consent to be his wife, she consented, and Robert was acquitted On the wedding day, her lover Edward returned to claim her hand, Norris was seized as a murderer, and Marian was saved—S Knowles, The Daughter (1836)

Robert, a servant of sir Arthur Wardour at Knockwinnoch Castle—Sir W Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III)

Robert (Mons), a neighbour of Sganarelle Hearing the screams of Mde Martine (Sganarelle's wife), he steps over to make peace between them, whereupon madame calls him an impertinent fool, and says, if she chooses to be beaten by her husband, it is no affair of his, and Sganarelle says, "Je la veux battre, si je le veux, et ne la veux pas battre, si je ne le veux pas," and beats M Robert again—Molière, Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666)

Robert Macaire, a bluff, free-living libertine His accomplice is Bertrand, a simpleton and a villain—L'Auberge des Adrets, by Antier, etc

Robert Street, Adelphi, London So called from Robert Adams, the builder

Robert duke of Albany, brother of Robert III of Scotland—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Robert duke of Normandy sold his dominions to Rufus for 10,000 marks, to furnish him with ready money for the crusade, which he joined at the head of 1000 heavy-armed horse and 1000 light-armed Normans—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Robert III of Scotland, introduced by sir W Scott in the Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV.)

Robert le Diable, son of Bertha and Bertramo Bertha was the daughter of Robert duke of Normandy, and Bertramo was a fiend in the guise of a knight The opera shows the struggle in Robert between the virtue inherited from his mother and the vice inherited from his father His father allures him to gamble till he loses everything, and then claims his soul, but his foster-sister Alice counterplots the fiend, and rescues Robert by reading to him his mother's will—Meyerbeer, Roberto il Diavolo (libretto by Scribe, 1831)

* * Robert le Diable was the hero of an old French metrical romance (thirteenth century) This romance in the next century was thrown into prose There is a miracle-play on the same subject

Robert of Paris (Count), one of the crusading princes The chief hero of this novel is Hereward (3 syl), one of the Varangian guard of the emperor Alexius Comnenus He and the count fight a single combat with battle-axes, after which Hereward enlists under the count's banner, and marries Bertha also called

Agatha—Sir W Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Robert the Devil or Robert the Magnificent, Robert I duke of Normandy, father of William "the Conqueror" (*, 1028-1035)

Robert François Damiens, who tried to assassinate Louis XV, was popularly so called (*, 1714-1757)

Roberts, cash-keeper of Master George Heriot the king's goldsmith—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Robin, servant of captain Rowewell, whom he helps in his love adventure with Arethusa daughter of Argus—Carey, Contrivances (1715)

Robin, brother-in-law of Farmer Crop, of Cornwall Having lost his property through the villainy of lawyer Endless, he emigrates, and in three years returns The ship is wrecked off the coast of Cornwall, and Robin saves Frederick the young squire On landing, he meets his old sweetheart Margaretta at Crop's house, and the acquaintance is renewed by mutual consent—P Hoare, No Song no Supper (1790)

Robin, a young gardener, fond of the minor theatres, where he has picked up a taste for sentimental fustian, but all his rhapsodies bear upon his trade Thus, when Wilhelmina asks why he wishes to dance with her, he replies

Ask the plants why they love a shower ask the sun flower why it loves the sun ask the snowdrop why it is white ask the violet why it is blue ask the trees why they blossom the cabbages why they grow 'Tis all because they can't help it no more can I help my love for you.—C Dibdin The Waterman I. (1774)

Robin (Old), butler to old Mr Ralph Morton of Milnwood—Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Robin Bluestring Sir Robert Walpole was so called, in allusion to his blue ribbon as a knight of the Garter (1676-1745)

Robin Gray (Auld). The words of this song are by lady Anne Landsav, daughter of the earl of Balcarras, she was afterwards lady Barnard The song was written in 1772 to an old Scotch tune called The Bridegroom Grat when the Sun gaed Down (See GRAY, p 402)

Robin Hood was born at Locksley, in Notts, in the reign of Henry II (1160) His real name was Fitzooth, and it is commonly said that he was the earl of Huntingdon Having outrun his fortune, and being outlawed, he lived as a freebooter in Barnsdale (Yorkshire), Sherwood (Notts), and Plompton Park (Cumberland) His chief companions were Little John (whose name was Naylor), William Scadlock (or Scarlet), George Green the pinder (or pound-keeper) of Wakefield, Much a miller's son, and Tuck a friar, with one female named Marian His company at one time consisted of a hundred archers He was bled to death in his old age by a relative, the prioress of Kirkley's Nunnery, in Yorkshire, November 18, 1247, aged 87 years

 An excellent sketch of Robin Hood is given by Drayton in his Polyolbion, xxvi Sir W Scott introduces him in two novels—Ivanhoe and The Talisman In the former he first appears as Locksley the archer, at the tournament He is also called "Dickon Bend-the-Bow"

The following dramatic pieces have the famous outlaw for the hero—Robin Hood, 1 (1597), Munday, Robin Hood, II (1598), Chettle, Robin Hood (1741), an opera, by Dr Arne and Burney, Robin Hood (1787), an opera, by O'Keefe, music by Shield, Robin Hood, by Macnally (before 1820)

Major tells us that this famous robber took away the goods of rich men only, never killed any person except in self-defence, never plundered the poor, but charitably fed them, and adds, "he was the most humane and the prince of all robbers"—Britannia's History, 128 (1740)

The abbot of St Mary's, in York, and the sheriff of Nottingham were his bêtes noires Munday and Chettle wrote a popular play in 1601, entitled The Death of Robert Earl of Huntington

Robin Redbreast One tradition is that the robin peeked a thorn out of the crown of thorns when Christ was on His way to Calvary, and the blood which issued from the wound, falling on the bird, dyed its breast red

Another tradition is that it carries in its bill dew to those shut up in the burning lake, and its breast is red from being scorched by the fire of Gehenna

He brings cool dew in his little bill,
And lets it fall on the souls of sin
You can see the mark on his red breast still
Of fires that scorch as he drops it in Robinson Cru'soe (2 syl), a tale by Daniel Defoe Robinson Crusoe ran away from home, and went to sea

Being wrecked, he led for many years a solitary existence on an uninhabited island of the tropics, and relieved the weariness of life by numberless contrivances At length he met a human being, a young Indian, whom he saved from death on a Friday He called him his "man Friday," and made him his companion and servant

Defoe founded this story on the adventures of Alexander Selkirk, sailing-master of the Cinque Ports Galley, who was left by captain Stradling on the desolate island of Juan Fernandez for four years and four months (1704-1709), when he was rescued by captain Woodes Rogers and brought to England

Roc, a white bird of enormous size. Its strength is such that it will lift up an elephant from the ground and carry it to its mountain nest, where it will devour it. In the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, it was a roc which carried Sindbad the sailor from the island on which he had been deserted by his companions ("Second Voyage"). And it was a roc which carried Agib from the castle grounds of the ten young men who had lost their right eyes ("The Third Calender's Story"). Sindbad says one claw of the roc is as "big as the trunk of a large tree," and its egg is "fifty paces [150 feet] in circumference."

Roche's Bird (Sir Boyle), which was "in two places at the same time." The tale is that sir Boyle Roche said in the House of Commons, "Mr Speaker, it is impossible I could have been in two places at once, unless I were a bird." This is a quotation from Jonson's play, The Devil of a Wife (seventeenth century)

Roderick, the thirty-fourth and last of the Gothic kings of Spain, son of Theodofred and Rusilla. Having violated Florinda, daughter of count Julian, he was driven from his throne by the Moors, and assumed the garb of a monk with the name of "father Macanabec." He was present at the great battle of Covadonga, in which the Moors were cut to pieces, but what became of him afterwards no one knows. His helm, sword, and cuirass were found, so was his steed. Several generations passed away, when, in a hermitage near Viscu, a tomb was discovered, "which bore in ancient characters king Roderick's name," but imagination must fill up the gap. He is spoken of as most popular.

Time has been
When not a tongue within the Pyrenees
Dared whisper in dispraise of Roderick's name
Lest, if the conscious air had caught the sound
The vengeance of the hoivest multitude
Should fall upon the traitorous head, and brand
For life long infamy the living lips.

Roland, count of Mans and knight of Blaves. His mother, Bertha, was Charlemagne's sister. Roland is represented as brave, devotedly loyal, unsuspicious, and somewhat too easily imposed upon. He was eight feet high, and had an open countenance. In Italian romance he is called Orlan'do. He was slain in the valley of Roncesvallès as he was leading the rear of his uncle's army from Spain to France. Charlemagne himself had reached St Jean Pied de Port at the time, heard the blast of his nephew's horn, and knew it announced treachery, but was unable to render him assistance (A D 778)

Roland is the hero of Théroulde's Chanson de Roland, of Turpin's Chronique, of Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato, of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, of Piccini's opera called Roland (1778), etc

Roland's Horn, Olivant or Olifant. It was won from the giant Jatmund, and might be heard at the distance of thirty miles. Birds fell dead at its blast, and the whole Saracen army drew back in terror when they heard it. So loud it sounded, that the blast reached from Roncesvallès to St Jean Pied de Port, a distance of several miles.

Roland lifts Olivant to his mouth and blows it with all his might. The mountains around are lofty but high as they hear the sound of the horn arise (at the third blast it splits in twain)—Song of 10 and 12 sung by Taillefer at the battle of Hastings. See Warton History of English Poetry v 1 sect iii 132 (1781)

Roland's Horse, Veillantif, called in Italian Feghan'tino ("the little vigilant one")

In Italian romance, Orlando has another horse, called Brighado'ro ("gold bridle")

Roland's Spear. Visitors are shown a spear in the cathedral of Pa'va, which they are told belonged to Roland

Roland's Sword, Duran'dal, made by the fairies. To prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy when Roland was attacked in the valley of Roncesvallès, he smote a rock with it, and it made in the solid rock a fissure some 300 feet in depth, called to this day La Brèche de Roland

Then would I seek the Pyrenean branch
Which Roland clove with huge two-handed sway,
And to the enormous labour left his name,
Wordsworth.

* * A sword is shown at Rocamadour, in the department of Lot (France), which visitors are assured was Roland's Duran'dal. But the romances say that Roland, dying, threw his sword into a poisoned stream

Death of Roland. There is a tradition that Roland escaped the general slaughter in the defile of Roncesvallès, and died of starvation while trying to make his way across the mountains—John de la Bruere Champier, De Cibaria, xvi 5

Died like Roland, died of thirst

After the death of Ade, Roland "sought the battle-field again, and fell at Koneevall"—Campbell, The Brave Roland

Roldan, "El encantado," Roldan made invulnerable by enchantment. The cleft "Roldan," in the summit of a high mountain in the kingdom of Valencia, was so called because it was made by a single back-stroke of Roldan's sword. Sir Charles Napier is credited with a far more laconic despatch on making himself master of Scinde in 1843. Taking possession of Hyderabad, and outflanking Shere Mohammed by a series of most brilliant manœuvres, he is said to have written home this punning despatch Peccavi ("I have sinned" [Scinde])

Roman Father (The), Horatius, father of the Horatii and of Horatia. The story of the tragedy is the well-known Roman legend about the Horatii and Curiatii. Horatius rejoices that his three sons have been selected to represent Rome, and sinks the affection of the father in love for his country. Horatia is the betrothed of Caius Curiatius, but is also beloved by Valerius, and when the Curiatii are selected to oppose her three brothers, she sends Valerius to him with a scarf to induce him to forego the fight. Caius declines, and is slain. Horatia is distracted, they take from her every instrument of death, and therefore she resolves to provoke her surviving brother, Publius, to kill her. Meeting him in his triumph, she rebukes him for murdering her lover, scoffs at his "patriotism," and Publius kills her. Horatius now resigns Publius to execution for murder, but the king and Roman people rescue him—W. Whitehead (1741)

Should breed thy fellow

Shakespeare Julius Caesar act v sc. 3 (1607)

Romans (Most Learned of the), Marcus Terentius Varro (B.C. 116-28)

Romance of the Rose, a poetical allegory, begun by Guillaume de Lorris in the latter part of the thirteenth century, and continued by Jean de Meung in the former half of the fourteenth century. The poet dreams that Dame Idleness conducts him to the palace of Pleasure, where he meets Love, whose attendant maidens are Sweet-looks, Courtesy, Youth, Joy, and Competence, by whom he is conducted to a bed of roses. He singles out one, when an arrow from Love's bow stretches him fainting on the ground, and he is carried off. When he comes to himself, he resolves, if possible, to find his rose, and Welcome promises to aid him, Shyness, Fear, and Slander obstruct him, and Reason advises him to give up the quest. Pity and Kindness show him the object of his search, but Jealousy seizes Welcome, and locks her in Fear Castle. Here the original poem ends. The sequel, somewhat longer than the twenty-four books of Homer's Iliad, takes up the tale from this point.

Roma'no, the old monk who took pity on Roderick in his flight (viii), and went with him for refuge to a small hermitage on the sea-coast, where they remained for twelve months, when the old monk died.—Southey, Roderick, the Last of the Goths, i, ii (1814)

Rome Does (Do as). The saying originated with St. Ambrose (fourth century). It arose from the following diversity in the observance of Saturday.—The Milanese make it a feast, the Romans a fast. St. Ambrose, being asked what should be done in such a case, replied, "In matters of indifference, it is better to be guided by the general usage. When I am at Milan, I do not fast on Saturdays, but when I am at Rome, I do as they do at Rome."

Rome of the North. Cologne was so called (says Hope) in the Middle Ages, from its wealth, power, and ecclesiastical foundations.

Rome Saved by Geese. When the Gauls invaded Rome, a detachment in single file scaled the hill on which the capitol stood, so silently that the foremost man reached the summit without being challenged, but while striding over the rampart, some sacred geese were disturbed, and by their cackle aroused the guard. Marcus Manlius rushed to the wall, and hustled the Gaul over, thus saving the capitol.

A somewhat parallel case occurred in Ireland in the battle of Glinsaly, Donegal. A party of the Irish would have surprised the protestants if some wrens had not disturbed the guards by the noise they made in hopping about the drums and pecking on the parchment heads.—Aubrey, Miscellanies, 45

Ro'meo, a son of Montague (3 syl), in love with Juliet the daughter of Capulet, but between the houses of Montague and Capulet there existed a deadly feud. As the families were irreconcilable, Juliet took a sleeping draught, that she might get away from her parents and elope with Romeo. Romeo, thinking her to be dead, killed himself, and when Juliet awoke and found her lover dead, she also killed herself.—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1598)

Fox said that Barry's "Romeo" was superior to Garrick's (S. Rogers, Table Talk). Fitzgerald says that Barry was the superior in the garden-scenes and in the first part of the tomb, but Garrick in the scene with the "friar" and in the dying part.

Romeo and Juliet, a tragedy by Shakespeare (1598). The tale is taken from Romeo and Julietta, a novel by Boisteau in French, borrowed from an Italian story by Bandello (1554).

In 1662 Arthur Brooke produced the same tale in verse, called The Tragical History of Romeus and Juliet. In 1667 Painter published a prose translation of Boisteau's novel.

Romp (The), a comic opera altered from Bickerstaff's Love in the City. Priscilla Tomboy is "the romp," and the plot is given under that name.

A splendid portrait of Mrs. Jordan in her character of 'The Pomp' hung over the mantelpiece in the dining room [of Adolphus Fitzclarence].—Lord W. P. Lennox Celebrities etc. i. 11.

Rom'uald (St). The Catalans had a great reverence for a hermit so called, and hearing that he was about to quit their country, called together a parish meeting, consult how they might best retain him agst them, "For," said they, "he certainly be consecrated, and his s will bring a fortune to us" So agreed to strangle him, but their tion being told to the hermit, he tly made his escape—St Foix,

His Historiques sur Paris, v 163

Rogue Gunnart, a freebooter, whose real name was Pedro Rocha Gunnarda He is introduced by Cervantes in Don Quixote

Rosa, a village beauty, patronized by lady Dedlock She marries Mrs Rouncewell's grandson —C Dickens, Bleak House
 (1852)

Rosabelle (3 syl), the lady's-maid of lady Geraldine Rosabelle promised to marry L'Eclair, the orderly of chevalier Florian — W Dimond, The Foundling of the Forest.

Rosalind (ie Rose Daniel), the shepherd lass who rejected Colin Clout (the poet Spenser) for Menalcas (John Florio the lexicographer (1579). Spenser was at the time in his twenty-sixth year. Being rejected by Rosalind, he did not marry till he was nearly 41, and then we are told that Elizabeth was "the name of his mother, queen, and wife" (Sonnet, 74). In the Faery Queen, "the country lass" (Rosalind) is introduced dancing with the Graces, and the poet says she is worthy to be the fourth (bk vi 10, 16). In 1595 appeared the Epithalamion, in which the recent marriage is celebrated — Ed Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar, i, vi (1579).

"Rosalinde" is an anagram for Rose Daniel, evidently a well-educated young lady of the north, and probably the "lady Mirabella" of the Faery Queen, vi 7, 8. Spenser calls her "the widow's daughter of the glen" (ecl iv), supposed to be either Burnley or Colne, near Hurstwood, in Yorkshire. Ecl i is the plaint of Colin for the loss of Rosalind. Ecl vi is a dialogue between Colin and Hobbinol his friend, in which Colin laments, and Hobbinol tries to comfort him. Ecl vii is a similar lament to ecl i. Rose Daniel married John Florio the lexicographer, the "Holofernes" of Shakespeare.

Rosalind, daughter of the banished duke who went to live in the forest of Arden. Rosalind was retained in her uncle's court as the companion of his daughter Celia, but when the usurper banished her, Celia resolved to be her companion, and for greater security Rosalind dressed as a boy, and assumed the name of Ganymed, while Celia dressed as a peasant girl, and assumed the name of Aliana. The two girls went to the forest of Arden, and lodged for a time in a hut, but they had not been long there when Orlando encountered them. Orlando and Rosalind had met before at a wrestling match, and the acquaintance was now renewed, Ganymed resumed her proper apparel, and the two were married with the sanction of the duke — Shakespeare, As You Like It (1598).

Nor shall the griefs of Lear be alleviated, or the charms and wit of Rosalind be availed by time — N Drake M.D. Shakespeare and His Times II. 554 (1817).

Rosaline, the niece of Capulet, with whom Romeo was in love before he saw Juliet. Mercutio calls her "a p- hearted wench," and Romeo says she is not "grace for grace and love for love," like Juliet — Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet (1598).

* * Rosaline is frequently mentioned in the first act of the play, but is not of the dramatis personæ.

Rosaline, a lady in attendance on the princess of France. A sharp wit wedded to her will, and "two pearls were stuck in her face for eyes." Rosaline is called "a merry, mirth-stirring spirit." Biron, a lord in attendance on Ferdinand king of Navarre, proposes marriage to her, but she replies

You must be purged first, your sins are ranked.
Therefore if you my favour mean to get
A twelvemonth shall you spend, and never rest,
But seek the weary beds of people sick.

Shakespeare Love's Labour's Lost (1594).

Rosalu'ra, the airy daughter Nantollet, beloved by Belleur — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Wild-goose Chase (1652).

Ros'amond (The Fair), Jane Clifford, daughter of Walter lord Clifford. The lady was loved not wisely but too well by Henry II, who kept her in concealment in a labyrinth at Woodstock. Queen Eleanor compelled the frail favourite to swallow poison (1177).

She was the faire daughter of Walter lord Clifford. Henry made for her a house of wonderful working that no man or woman might come to her. This house was named Labyrinthus, and was wrought like unto a knot, in a garden called a maze. But the queen came to her by a clue of thredde, and so dealt with her that she lived not long after. She was buried at Godstow in house of nunnas, with these verses upon her tombe.

Here I set in tumba Rosa mundi non Rosa munda,
Non redolent sed olet, que redolere solet.

Here Rosa the graced, not Rosa the chaste, repotes
The smell that rises is no smell of roses. E.C.R.

* * The subject has been a great favourite with poets. We have in English the following tragedies — The Complaint of Rosamond, by S. Daniel (before 1619), Henry II with the Death of Rosamond, either Bancroft or Mountford (1693), Rosamond, by Addison (1706), Henry and Rosamond, by Hawkins (1749), Fair Rosamond, by Tennyson (1879). In Italian Rosmonda, by Rucellai (1526). In Spanish Rosmunda, by Gil y Zarate (1840). We have also Rosamond, an opera, by Dr. Arne (1733), and Rosamonde, a poem in French, by C. Briffaut (1813). Sir Walter Scott has introduced the beautiful soiled dove in two of his novels — The Talisman and Woodstock.

* * Dryden says her name was Jane.

Jane Clifford was her name as books aver
Fair Rosamond was but her name de guerre.

Rudge (Barnaby), a half-witted young man of three and twenty years old, rather spare, of a fair height and strong make. His hair, of which he had a great profusion, was red, and hung in disorder about his face and shoulders. His face was pale, his eyes glassy and protruding. His dress was green, clumsily trimmed here and there with gaudy lace. A pair of tawdry ruffles dangled at his wrists, while his throat was nearly bare. His hat was ornamented with a cluster of peacock's feathers, limp, broken, and trailing down his back. Girded to his side was the steel hilt of an old sword, without blade or scabbard, and a few knee-ribbons completed his attire. He had a large raven, named Grip, which he carried at his back in a basket, a most knowing rump, which used to cry out in a hoarse voice, "Halloa!" "I'm a devil!" "Never say die!" "Polly, put the kettle on!"

Barnaby joined the Gordon rioters for the proud pleasure of carrying a flag and wearing a blue bow. He was arrested and lodged in Newgate, from whence he made his escape, with other prisoners, when the jail was burnt down by the rioters, but both he and his father and Hugh, being betrayed by Dennis the hangman, were recaptured, brought to trial, and condemned to death, but by the influence of Gabriel Varden the locksmith, the poor half-witted lad was reprieved, and lived the rest of his life with his mother in a cottage and garden near the May pole.

Here he lived, tending the poultry and the cattle working in a garden of his own and helping every one. He was known to every bird and beast about the place and had a name for every one. Never was there a lighter hearted husbandman a creature more popular with young and old a blither and more happy soul than Barnaby.—Ch. lxxix.

Mr Rudge, the father of Barnaby, supposed to have been murdered the same night as Mr Haredale, to whom he was steward. The fact is that Rudge himself was the murderer both of Mr Haredale and also of his faithful servant, to whom the crime was falsely attributed. After the murder, he was seen by many haunting the locality, and was supposed to be a ghost. He joined the Gordon rioters when they attacked and burnt to the ground the house of Mr Haredale, the son of the murdered man, and, being arrested (ch lvi), was sent to Newgate, but made his escape with the other prisoners when it was burnt down by the rioters. Being betrayed by Dennis, he was brought to trial for murder, but we are not told if he was executed (ch lxxiii). His name is not mentioned again, and probably he suffered death.

Mrs [Mary] Rudge, mother of Barnaby, and very like him, "but where in his face there was wildness and vacaney, in hers there was the patient composure of long effort and quiet resignation." She was a widow. Her husband (steward at the Warren), who murdered his master, Mr Haredale, and his servant, told her of his deed of blood a little before the birth of Barnaby, and the woman's face ever after inspired terror. It was thought for many years that Rudge had been murdered in defending his master, and Mrs Rudge was allowed a pension by Mr Haredale, son and heir of the murdered man. This pension she subsequently refused to take. After the reprieve of Barnaby, Mrs Rudge lived with him in a cottage near the May pole, and her last days were her happiest.—C. Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1841).

Rudiger, a wealthy Hun, liegeman of Etzel, sent to conduct Kriemhild to Hungary. When Günther and his suite went to visit Kriemhild, Rudiger entertained them all most hospitably, and gave his daughter in marriage to Giselher (Kriemhild's brother). In the broil which ensued, Rudiger was killed fighting against Gernot, but Gernot dropped down dead at the same moment, "each by the other slain"—Nibelungen Lied (by the minnesingers, 1210).

Rudiger, a knight who came to Waldhurst in a boat drawn by a swan. Margaret fell in love with him. At every tournament he bore off the prize, and in everything excelled the youths about him. Margaret became his wife. A child was born. On the christening day, Rudiger carried it along the banks of the Rhine, and nothing that Margaret said could prevail on him to go home. Presently, the swan and boat came in sight, and carried all three to a desolate place, where was a deep cavern. Rudiger got on shore, still holding the babe, and Margaret followed. They reached the cave, two giant arms clasped Rudiger, Margaret sprang forward and seized the infant, but Rudiger was never seen more.

—R Southey, Rudiger (a ballad from Thomas Heywood's notes).

Ruffians' Hall. West Smithfield was for many years so called, because of its being the usual rendezvous for duellists, pugilists, and other "ruffians."

Rugg (Mr.), a lawyer living at Pentonville. A red-haired man, who wore a hat with a high crown and narrow brim. Mr Paneks employed him to settle the business pertaining to the estate which had long lain unclaimed, to which Mr Dorrit was heir-at-law. Mr Rugg delighted in legal difficulties as much as a housewife in her jams and preserves. — C Dickens, Little Dorrit (1857)

Ruggiero, a young Saracen knight, born of Christian parents. He fell in love with Bradamant (sister of Rinaldo), whom he ultimately married. Ruggiero is especially noted for possessing a hippogriff or winged horse, and a shield of such dazzling splendour that it blinded those who looked on it. He threw away this shield into a well, because it enabled him to win victory too cheaply. — Orlando Innamorato (1495), and Orlando Furioso (1516)

Rule a Wife and Have a Wife, a comedy by Beaumont and Fletcher (1640). Donna Margaritta, a lady of great wealth, wishes to marry in order to mask her intrigues, and seeks for a husband a man without spirit, whom she can mould to her will. Leon, the brother of Altea, is selected as the "softest fool in Spain," and the marriage takes place. After marriage, Leon shows himself firm, courageous, high-minded, but most affectionate. He "rules his wife" and her household with a masterly hand, wins the respect of every one, and the wife, wholly reclaimed, "loves, honours, and obeys" him.

Rumpelstilzchen [Rumple stiltz-s/m], an irritable, deformed dwarf. He aided a miller's daughter, who had been enjoined by the king to spin straw into gold, and the condition he made with her for this service was that she should give him for wife her first daughter. The miller's daughter married the king, and when her first daughter was born the mother grieved so bitterly that the dwarf consented to absolve her of her promise, if, within three days, she could find out his name. The first day passed, but the secret was not discovered, the second passed with no better success, but on the third day some of the queen's servants heard a strange voice singing

Rumpelstilzchen is my name

The queen, being told thereof, saved her child, and the dwarf killed himself from rage. — German Popular Stories

Rust (Martin), an absurd old antiquary. "He likes no coins but those which have no head on them." He took a fancy to Juliet, the niece of sir Thomas Lofly, but preferred his "Æneas, his precious relic of Troy," to the living beauty, and Juliet preferred Richard Bever to Mr Rust, so matters were soon amicably adjusted — Foote, The Patron (1761)

Rustam, chief of the Persian mythical heroes, son of Zâl "the Fair," king of India, and regular descendant of Benjamin the beloved son of Jacob the patriarch. He delivered king Caicâus (4 syl) from prison, but afterwards fell into disgrace because he refused to embrace the religious system of Zoroaster. Caicâus sent his son Asfendiar (or Isfendiar) to convert him, and, as persuasion availed nothing, the logic of single combat was resorted to. The fight lasted two days, and then Rustam discovered that Asfendiar bore a "charmed life, proof against all wounds. The valour of these two heroes is proverbial, and the Persian romances are full of their deeds of fight

Rustam's Horse, Reksh — Chardin, Travels (1686-1711)

In Matthew Arnold's poem Sohrab and Rustum, Rustum fights with Sohrab, overcomes him, and finds too late he has slain his own son

Rustam, son of Taniur king of Persia. He had a trial of strength with Rustam son of Zâl, which was to pull away from his adversary an iron ring. The combat was never decided, for Rustam could no more conquer Rustam than Roland could overcome Oliver — Chardin, Travels (1686-1711)

Rusticus's Pig, the pig on which Rusticus fed daily, but which never diminished

Two Christians travelling in Poland came to the door of Rusticus a heathen peasant, who had killed a fat hog to celebrate the birth of a son. Ryence (Sir), king of Wales, Ireland, and many of the isles—When Arthur first mounted the throne, king Ryence, in scorn, sent a messenger to say "he had purified a mantle with the beards of kings, but the mantle lacked one more beard to complete the lining, and he requested Arthur to send his beard by the messenger, or else he would come and take head and beard too"—Part of the insolence was in this—Arthur at the time was too young to have a beard at all, and he made answer, "Tell your master, my beard at present is all too young for purfling, but I have an arm quite strong enough to drag him hither, unless he comes without delay to do me homage"—By the advice of Merlin, the two brothers Balin and Balan set upon the insolent king, on his way to lady De Vance, overthrew him, slew "more than forty of his men, and the remnant fled"—King Ryence craved for mercy, so "they laid him on a horse-litter, and sent him captive to king Arthur"—Sir T. The Korân (ch xxvii) tells us that Solomon summoned before him all the birds to the valley of ants, but the lapping did not put in an appearance—Solomon was angry, and was about to issu an order of death, when the bird presented itself, saying, "I come from Sabr, where I found a queen reigning in great magnificence, but she and her subjects worship the sun." On hearing this, Solomon sent back the lapwing to Saba with a letter, which the bird was to drop at the foot of the queen, commanding her to come at once, submit herself unto him, and accept from him the "true religion." So she came in great state, with a train of 500 slaves of each sex, bearing 500 "bricks of solid gold," a crown, and sundry other presents.

The word saffron was wholly unknown in the Greek or Latin language. There is the Greek word "saophron," but that was a girdle worn by girls, indicative of chastity. (Saffron is the Arabic zaphran through the French safra.)

Saga, the goddess of history — Scandinavian Mythology

Saga and Edda. The Edda is the Bible of the ancient Scandinavians. A saga is a book of instruction, generally but not always in the form of a tale, like a Welsh "mabinogi." In the Edda there are numerous sagas. As our Bible contains the history of the Jews, religious songs, moral proverbs, and religious stories, so the Edda contained the history of Norway, religious songs, a book of proverbs, and numerous stories. The original Edda was compiled and edited by Sæmund Sigfusson, an Icelandic priest and seald, in the eleventh century. It contains twenty-eight parts or books, all of which are in verse.

Two hundred years later, Snorri Sturleson of Iceland abridged, re-arranged, and redneered to prose the Edda, giving the various parts a kind of dramatic form, like the dialogues of Plato. It then became needful to distinguish these two works, so the old poetical compilation is called the Elder or Rhythmical Edda, and sometimes the Sæmund Edda, while the more modern work is called the Younger or Prose Edda, and sometimes the Snorri Edda. The Younger Edda is, however, partly original. Pt 1 is the old Edda reduced to prose, but pt 11 is Sturleson's own collection. This part contains "The Discourse of Bragi" (the scald of the gods) on the origin of poetry, and here, too, we find the famous story called by the Germans the Nibelungen Lied.

Sagas. Besides the sagas contained in the Eddas, there are numerous others. Indeed, the whole saga literature extends over 200 volumes.

I THE EDDA SAGAS. The Edda is divided into two parts and twenty-eight lays or poetical sagas. The first part relates to the gods and heroes of Scandinavia, creation, and the early history of Norway. The Scandinavian "Books of Genesis" are the "Voluspá Saga" or "prophecy of Völva" (about 230 verses), "Vafthrúdnar's Saga," and "Grimner's Saga." These three resemble the Sibylline books of ancient Rome, and give a description of chaos, the formation of the world, the creation of all animals (including dwarfs, giants, and fairies), the general conflagration, and the renewal of the world, when, like the new Jerusalem, it will appear all glorious, and there shall in no wise enter therein "anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie."

The "Book of Proverbs" in the Edda is called the "Hávamál Saga," and sometimes "The High Song of Odin."

The "Völsunga Saga" is a collection of lays about the early Teutonic heroes.

The "Saga of St. Olaf" is the history of this Norwegian king. He was a savage tyrant, hated by his subjects, but because he aided the priests in forcing Christianity on his subjects, he was canonized.

The other sagas in the Edda are "The Song of Lodbrog" or "Lodbrog," "Hervarar Saga," the "Völundr Saga," the "Blomsturvalla Saga," the "Ynglinga Saga" (all relating to Norway), the "Joms-vikings Saga," and the "Knytlinga Saga" (which pertain to Denmark), the "Sturlunga Saga," and the "Eyrbyggja Saga" (which pertain to Iceland). All the above were compiled and edited by Sæmund Sigfusson, and are in verse, but Snorri Sturleson reduced them to prose in his prose version of the old Edda.

II SAGAS NOT IN THE EDDA. Snorri Sturleson, at the close of the twelfth century, made the second great collection of chronicles in verse, called the Heimskringla Saga, or the book of the kings of Norway, from the remotest period to the year 1177. This is a most valuable record of the laws, customs, and manners of the ancient Scandinavians. Samuel Laing published his English translation of it in 1844.

1 The Icelandic Sagas. Besides the two Icelandic sagas collected by Sæmund Sigfusson, numerous others were subsequently embodied in the Landnámabók, set on foot by Ari hinn Fróndi, and continued by various hands.

2 Frithjof's Saga contains the life and adventures of Frithjof of Iceland, who fell in love with Ingeborg, the beautiful wife of Hring, king of Norway. On the death of Hring, the young widow married her Icelandic lover. Frithjof lived in the sixteenth century, and this saga was compiled at the beginning of the fourteenth century, a year or two after the Henschirja. It is very interesting, because Tegner, the Swedish poet, has selected it for his Idylls (1827), just as Tegner has taken his idyllic stories from the Morte d'Artur or the Welsh Mabinogion. Tegner's Idylls were translated into English by Latham (1838), by Stephens (1841), and by Blackley (1847).

3 The Swedish Saga or lay of Swedish "history" is the 11 years Saga.

4 The Russian Saga or lay of Russian legendary history is the Pyrrhus Saga.

5 The Norse Sagas are stories of romance. From this ancient collection we have derived our nursery tales of Jack and the Bean-Staff, Jack the Giant-Killer, the Great who robit the Head of an Englishman, Blue Bird, Cinderella, the Little Old Woman at the Spinning Wheel, the Pig that would go over the hill, Cat in Boots, and even the first sketches of Whitby and His Cat and Parrot. See Dasent's Tales from the Norse (1859).

6 Sagas of Foreign origin. Besides the rich stores of original tales, several foreign ones have been imported and translated into Norse, such as Barliam and Japhet, by Paulus of Iona, one of the German minnesingers (see p. 79). On the other hand the minnesingers borrowed from the Norse sagas their famous story embodied in the Niflungen Lied, called the "German Iliad," which is from the second part of Snorrio Sturluson's Edda.

Sagaman, a narrator of sagas. These ancient chroniclers differed from scalds in several respects. Scalds were minstrels, who celebrated in verse the exploits of living kings or national heroes, sagamen were tellers of legendary stories, either in prose or verse, like Schekherzadde the narrator of the Arabian Nights, the mandarin Fun-Hoam the teller of the Chinese Tales, Moradbrak the teller of the Oriental Tales, Uramoriz who told the tales to Lalla Pookh, and so on. Again, scalds resided at court, were attached to the royal suite, and followed the king in all his expeditions, but sagamen were free and unattached, and told their tales to prince or peasant, in lordly hall or at village water.

In Mr Emerson we have a poet and a profoundly religious man who is really and entirely undrained by the discoveries of science and present or prospective. In his case poetry with the joy of a Barlambal takes her greater broad expanse by the land, and cheers him with immortal light. In Emerson scientific conceptions are continually transmuted into the finer forms and warmer fires of an ideal world.—Professor Tyndall Progress of Science.

St. Brandan or San Bor'andan (The Island of), a firing island, some ninety leagues in length, west of the Canaries. In an old French geographical chart it is placed 5° west of Ferro Island, 29° N lat. So late as 1721 Spain sent an expedition in quest of this fabulous island. The Spaniards believe that king Podri'go ("the last of the Goths") made this island his retreat. The Portuguese assign it to St. Sebastian. The poets say it was rendered inaccessible to man by diabolical magic. Probably it owes its existence to some atmospheric illusion, such as the Fata morgana.

St. Cecili, Cecily, or Cecile (2 syl), the daughter of noble Roman parents, and a Christian. She married Valrian. One day, she told her husband she had "an angel that with gret love, wher so I wake or slepe, is redy ay my body for to kepe." Valrian requested to see this angel, and Cecile told him he must first go to St. Urban and, being purged by him "fro synne, than [then] schul ye se that aungel." Valrian was accordingly "crisened" by St. Urban, returned home, and found the angel with two crowns, brought direct from paradise. One he gave to Cecile and one to Valrian, saying that "bothe with the palme of martyrdom schullen come unto God's blisful feste." Valrian suffered martyrdom first, then Almachius, the Poman prefect, commanded his officers to "brenne Cecile in a bath of flammès red." She remained in the bath all day and night, yet "sat she cold, and felte of it no woe." Then smote they her three strokes upon the neck, but could not smite her head off. She lingered on for three whole days, preaching and teaching, and then died. St. Urban buried her body privately by night and her house he converted into a church, which he called the church of Cecily —Chancer, Cartbury Tales ("The Second Nun's Tale," 1338)

St. Christopher, a native of Lycia, very tall, and fearful to look at. He was so proud of his strength that he resolved to serve only the mightiest, and went in search of a worthy master. He first entered the service of the emperor, but one day, seeing his master cross himself for fear of the devil, he quitted his service for that of Satan. This new master he found was thrown into alarm at the sight of a cross, so he quitted him also, and went in search of the Saviour. One day, near a ferry, a little child accosted him, and begged the giant to carry him across the water. Christopher put the child on his back, but found every step he took that the child grew heavier and heavier, till the burden was more than he could bear. As he sank beneath his load, the child told the giant he was Christ, and Christopher resolved to serve Christ and Him alone. He died three days afterwards, and was canonized. The Greek and Latin Churches look on him as the protecting saint against floods, fire, and earthquake. —James de Voragine, Golden Legends, 100 (thirteenth century)

* * His body is said to be at Valencia, in Spain, one of his arms at Compostella, a jaw-bone at Astorga, a shoulder at St. Peter's, in Rome, and a tooth and rib at Venice. His day is May 9 in the Greek Church, and July 25 in the Latin. Of course, "the Christ-bearer" is an allegory. The gigantic bones called his relics may serve for "matters of faith" to give reality to the fable.

(His name before conversion was Officrus, but after he earned Christ across the ford, it was called Christ-Officrus, shortened into Christopher, which means "the Christ-bearer.")

St. Etienne There are sixty-nine places in France so called. A Paris newspaper stated that the "receiver of St. Etienne" had embezzled £1000, whereupon all the tax-gatherers of the sixty-nine places called St. Etienne brought separate actions against the paper, and the editor had to pay each one a hundred francs damages, besides fine and costs—Standard, February 24, 1879.

St. Filumena or FILUMENA, a new saint of the Latin Church. Sabatelli has a picture of this nineteenth-century saint, representing her as hovering over a group of sick and maimed, who are healed by her intercession. In 1802 a grave was found in the cemetery of St. Priscilla, and near it three tiles, with these words, in red letters

LUMENA

PAXTE

A rearrangement of the tiles made the inscription, PAX TE-CUM, FI-LUMENA.

That this was the correct rendering is quite certain, for the virgin martyr herself told a priest and a nun in a dream, that she was Fi[li]a Lumina, the daughter Lumina, i.e. the daughter of the Light of the world. In confirmation of this dream, as her bones were carried to Mugnano, the saint repaired her own skeleton, made her hair grow, and performed so many miracles, that those must indeed be hard of belief who can doubt the truth of the story.

St. George (Le chevalier de), James Francis Edward Stuart, called "The Old (or elder) Pretender" (1688-1766)

St. Graal. (See SANGRAAL)

St. Leon, the hero of a novel of the same name by W. Goodwin (1799). St. Leon becomes possessed of the "elixir of life," and of the "philosopher's stone," but this knowledge, instead of bringing him wealth and happiness, is the source of misery and endless misfortunes.

St. Leon is designed to prove that the happiness of mankind would not have been augmented by the gifts of immortal youth and inexhaustible riches.—Encyc. Brit. Art. Romance.

Saint Maur, one of the attendants of sir Reginald Front de Bœuf (a follower of prince John)—Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.)

St. Nicholas, the patron saint of boys. He is said to have been bishop of Myra, in Lycia, and his death is placed in the year 326.

St. Nicholas is said to have supplied three maidens with marriage portions by leaving at their windows bags of money. Another legend describes the saint as having restored to life three [? two] murdered children—Longe.

St. Patrick's Purgatory, in an islet in lough Derg, Ireland. Here the saint made a cave, through which was an entrance into purgatory, and here those who liked to do so might forestall their purgatorial punishments while they were in the flesh. This was made the subject of a romance in the fourteenth century, and Calderon dramatized the subject in the seventeenth century.

Who has not heard of St. Patrick's Purgatory with its chapels and its toll houses? Thither repair yearly crowds of pious pilgrims, who would wash away at once the accumulated sins of their lives.—Wright.

* * This source of revenue was abolished by order of the pope, on St Patrick's Day, 1497

St Peter's Obelisk, a stone pyramid of enormous size, on the top of which is an urn containing the relics of Julius Cæsar

St. Stephen's Chapel, properly the House of Commons, but sometimes applied to the two Houses of Parliament So called by a figure of speech from St Stephen's Chapel, built by king Stephen, rebuilt by Edward II and III, and finally destroyed by fire in 1834 St Stephen's Chapel was fitted up for the use of the House of Commons in the reign of Edward IV The great council of the nation met before in the chapter-house of the abbey

St Swithin, tutor of king Alfred, and bishop of Winchester The monks wished to bury him in the chancel of the minster, but the bishop had directed that his body should be interred under the open vault of heaven Finding the monks resolved to disobey his injunction, he sent a heavy rain on July 15, the day assigned to the funeral ceremony, in consequence of which it was deferred from day to day for forty days The monks then bethought them of the saint's injunction, and prepared to inter the body in the churchyard St Swithin smiled his approbation by sending a beautiful sunshiny day, in which all the robes of the hierarchy might be displayed without the least fear of being injured by untimely and untoward showers

St. Tammany, the patron of democracy in the American states His day is May 1 Tammany or Tammenund lived in the seventeenth century He was a native of Delaware, but settled on the banks of the Ohio He was a chief sachem of his tribe, and his rule was discreet and peaceful His great maxim was, "Unite In peace unite for mutual happiness, in war for mutual defence."

Salmigondin or "Salmigondin," a lordship of Dipodry, given by Pantagruel to Panurge (2 syl) Alcofribas, who had resided six months in the giant's mouth without his knowing it, was made castellan of the castle—Rabelais, Pantagruel, 11 32, 111 2 (1546-45)

The lordship of Salmigondin was worth 67 million pounds sterling per annum in "certain rent," and an annual revenue for locusts and periwinkles varying from £24 357 to 13 millions in a good year when the exports of locusts and periwinkles were flourishing. Panurge however could not make the two ends meet. At the close of less than fourteen days he had forestalled three years rent and revenue and had to apply to Pantagruel to pay his debts.—Pantagruel 111 2

Salmoncus (3-syl), king of Elis, wishing to be thought a god, used to imitate thunder by striking by driving his chariot over a wooden bridge, and burning torches on every side.

He was killed by lightning for his impiety and folly

Salmoncus who while he his carroach drove

Sangler (Sir), a knight who insisted on changing wives with a squire, and when the lady objected, be cut off her head, and rode off with the squire's wife. Being brought before sir Artegal, sir Sanglier insisted that the living lady was ~~his~~ wife, and that the dead woman was the squire's wife. Sir Artegal commanded that the living and dead women should both be cut in twain, and half of each be given to the two litigants. To this sir Sanglier gladly assented, but the squire objected, d'claring it would be far bitter to give the lady to the knight than that she should suffer death. On this, sir Artegal pronounced the living woman to be the squire's wife, and the dead one to be the knight's. —Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 1 (1596)

("Sir Sanglier" is meant for Sban O Neil, leader of the Irish insurgents in 1567. Of course, this judgment is borrowed from that of Solomon, 1 Kings vi 16-27.)

Sanglier des Ardenes, Guillaume de la Marck (1446-1485)

Sangraal, Sangreall, etc., generally said to be the holy plate from which Christ ate at the Last Supper, brought to England by Joseph of Arimathy. Whatever it was, it appeared to king Arthur and his 150 knights of the Round Table, but suddenly vanished, and all the knights vowed they would go in quest thereof. Only three, sir Bors, sir Percivale, and sir Galahad, found it, and only sir Galahad touched it, but he soon died, and was borne by angels up into heaven. The sangraal of Arthurian romance is "the dish" containing Christ transubstantiated by the sacrament of the Mass, and made visible to the bodily eye of man. This will appear quite obvious to the reader by the following extracts —

Then anon they heard creaking and crying of thunder in the midst of the blast entered a sunbeam more clean by seven times than the day, and all they were alighted of the grace of the Holy Ghost. Then there entered into the hall the Holy Grail covered with white samite, but there was none that could see it, nor who bare it, but the whole hall was full filled with good odours, and every knight had such meat and drink as he best loved in the world, and when the Holy Grail had been borne through the hall, then the holy vessel departed suddenly, and they wist not where it became. —Ch. 35

Then looked they and saw a man come out of the holy vessel, that had all the signs of the passion of Christ, and he said: "This is the holy dish wherein I ate the lamb on Shrove Thursday, and now hast thou seen it. Yet hast thou not seen it so openly as thou shalt see it in the city of Sarra, therefore thou must go hence and bear with thee this holy vessel, for this night it shall depart from the realm of Logris, and take with thee sir Percivale and sir Bors." —Ch. 101

So departed sir Galahad and sir Percivale and sir Bors with him. And so they rode three days, and came to a river, and found a ship, and when on board they found in the midst of the table of silver and the sangreall covered with red samite. Then sir Galahad laid him down and slept, and when he waked he saw the city of Sarra (ch. 103). At the year's end he saw before him the holy vessel and a man kneeling upon his knees in the likeness of the bishop, which had about him a great fellowship of angels as it had been Christ himself, and when he came to the saking of the Mass, and had done upon he called sir Galahad, and said unto him: Come forth, and thou shalt see that which thou hast much desired to see, and he beheld spiritual things. (ch. 104) —Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur III. 35, 101, 104 (1470)

The earliest story of the holy graal was in verse (A.D. 1100), author unknown.

Chrétien de Troyes has a romance in eight-syllable verse on the same subject (1170).

Guiot's tale of Titurul founder of Grail-burg, and Parzival prince thereof belongs to the twelfth century.

Wolfram von Eschenbach, a minnesinger, took Guiot's tale as the foundation of his poem (thirteenth century).

In Titurul the Younger the subject is very fully treated.

Sir T. Malory (in pt. iii of the History of Prince Arthur, translated in 1470 from the French) treats the subject in prose very fully.

R. S. Hawker has a poem on the Sangraal, but it was never completed.

Tennyson has an idyll called The Holy Grail (1858).

Boissier published, in 1834, at Munich, a work On the Description of the Temple of the Holy Grail.

Sangrado (Doctor), of Valladolid. This is the "Sagredo" of Espinel's romance called Marcos de Obregon. "The doctor was a tall, meagre, pale man, who had kept the shears of Clotho employed for forty years at least. He had a very solemn appearance, weighed his discourse, and used 'great pomp of words.' His reasonings were geometrical, and his opinions his own." Dr. Sangrado considered that blood was not needful for life, and that hot water could not be administered too plentifully into the system. Gil Blas became his servant and pupil, and was allowed to drink any quantity of water, but to eat only sparingly of beans, peas, and stewed apples.

Other physicians make the healing art consist in the knowledge of a thousand different sciences, but I go a shorter way to work, and spare the trouble of studying pharmacy, anatomy, botany, and physics. Know then that all which is required is to bleed the patients copiously, and make them drink warm water. —Lesage Gil Blas II. 2 (1735)

Dr. Hancock prescribed cold water and stewed prunes.

Dr. Rezzo of Baratana allowed Sanebo Panza to eat "a few wafers and a thin slice or two of quince." —Cervantes, Don Quixote, II. iii 10 (1615)

Sanjak-Sherif, the banner of Mahomet. (See p 593)

Sansar, the icy wind of death, kept in the deepest entrails of the earth, called in Thalaba "Sarsar"

She passed by rapid descents known only to Fblis, and thus penetrated the very entrails of the earth where breathes the Sansar or icy wind of death — W. Leckford Jack (1784)

Sansculottes (3 syl), a low, riff-raff party in the great French Revolution, so shabby in dress that they were termed "the trouser-less" The culotte is the breeches, called brack by the ancient Gauls, and hauts-de-chausses in the reign of Charles IX

Sansculottism, red republicanism, or the revolutionary platform of the Sansculottes

The Duke of Brunswick, at the head of a large army invaded France to restore Louis XVI to the throne and save legitimacy from the sacrilegious hands of sansculottism — G. H. Lewis Story of Goethe's Life

Literary Sansculottism, literature of a low character, like that of the "Minerva Press," the "Leipzic Fair," "Hollywell Street," "Grub Street," and so on

Sansfoy, a "faithless Saracen," who attacked the Red Cross Knight, but was slain by him "He cared for neither God nor man" Sansfoy personifies infidelity

Sansfoy full large of limb and every joint
He was, and cared not for God or man a point
Spenser Fairy Queen 1 2 (1590)

Sansjoy, brother of Sansfoy When he came to the court of Lucifer, he noticed the shield of Sansfoy on the arm of the Red Cross Knight, and his rage was so great that he was with difficulty restrained from running on the champion there and then, but Lucifer bade him defer the combat to the following day Next day, the fight began, but just as the Red Cross Knight was about to deal his adversary a death-blow, Sansjoy was enveloped in a thick cloud, and carried off in the chariot of Night to the infernal regions, where Asculapius healed him of his wounds — Spenser, Fairy Queen, 1 4, 5 (1590)

(The reader will doubtless call to mind the combat of Menelaos and Paris, and remember how the Trojan was invested in a cloud and carried off by Venus under similar circumstances — Homer, Iliad, 111)

Sansloy ("superstition"), the brother of Sansfoy and Sansjoy He carried off Una to the wilderness, but when the fauns and satyrs came to her rescue, he saved himself by flight

* * The meaning of this allegory is this Una (truth), separated from St George (holiness), is deceived by Hypocrisy, and immediately truth joins his poetry, it is carried away by superstition Spenser says the "simplicity of truth" abides with the common people, especially of the rural districts, after it is lost to towns and the luxurious great The historical reference is to queen Mary, in whose reign Una (the Reformation) was carried captive, and religion, being mixed up with hypocrisy, degenerated into superstition, but the rural population adhered to the simplicity of the protestant faith — Spenser, Fairy Queen, 1 2 (1590)

Sansonetto, a Christian regent of Mecca, viceroy of Charlemagne — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Sansuenna, now Saragossa

Santiago [Sant yaki go], the warrior of Spain, adopted because St James (Sant Iago) rendered, according to tradition, signal service to a Christian king of Spain in a battle against the Moors

Santiago for Spain This saint was James, son of Zebedee, brother of John He was beheaded, and caught his head in his hands as it fell The Jews were astonished, but when they touched the body they found it so cold that their hands and arms were paralyzed — Francisco Xavier, Anales de Gahcia (1733)

Santiago's Head When Santiago went to Spain in his marble ship, he had no head on his body The passage took seven days, and the ship was steered by the "presiding hand of Providence" — España Sagrada, xx 6

Santiago had two heads One of his heads is at Braga, and one at Compostella

* * John the Baptist had half a dozen heads at the least, and as many bodies, all capable of working miracles

Santiago leads the armies of Spain.

Thirty-eight instances of the interference of this saint are gravely set down as facts in the Chronicles of Galicia, and this is superadded "These instances are well known, but I hold it for certain that the appearances of Santiago in our victorious armies have been much more numerous, and in fact that every victory obtained by the Spaniards has been really achieved by this great captain" Once, when the rider on the white horse was asked in battle who he was, he distinctly made answer, "I am the soldier of the King of kings, and my name is James"—Don Miguel Lree Gimenez, Armas y Triunfos del Reino de Galicia, 648-9

The true name of this saint was Jacobo. We have first shortened Santo Jacobo into Santo Jaco. We clipped it again into Sant Jaco and by changing the J into I and the c into g we get Sant Iago. In household names we convert Iago into Diego or Blago which we soften into Diego—Ambrosio de Morales Coronica General de España ix. 7. sect. 2 (1536).

Santons, a body of religionists, also called Abdals, who pretended to be inspired with the most enthusiastic raptures of divine love. They were regarded by the vulgar as saints—Olearius, Reisebeschreibung, i. 971 (1647)

He diverted himself with the number of calendars santons, and devises who were continually coming and going, but especially with the Bralmins, saquirs and other enthusiasts, who had travelled from the heart of India, and halted on their way with the emir—Beckford, Vathek (1784)

Sapph'ia, a female liar—Acts v. 1

She is called the village Sapphira.—Crabbe.

Sappho (The English), Mrs Mary D Robinson (1758-1800)

Sappho (The French), Mlle Seudéri (1607-1701)

Sappho (The Scotch), Catherine Cockburn (1679-1749)

Sappho of Toulouse, Clémence Icaure (2 syl), who instituted, in 1490, Les Jeux Floraux. She is the authoress of a beautiful Ode to Spring (1463-1513)

Sapskull, a raw Yorkshire tike, son of squire Sapskull of Sapskull Hall. Sir Penurious Muckworm wishes him to marry his niece and ward Arbella, but as Arbella loves Gaylove a young barnster, the tike is played upon thus. Gaylove assumes to be Muckworm, and his lad Slango dresses up as a woman to pass for Arbella, and while Sapskull "marries" Slango, Gaylove, who assumes the dress and manners of the Yorkshire tike, marries Arbella. Of course, the trick is then discovered, and Sapskull returns to the home of his father, befooled but not married—Carey, The Honest Yorkshireman (1736)

Saracen (A), in Arthurian romance, means any unbaptized person, regardless of nationality. Thus, Priamus of Tuscany is called a Saracen (pt. i. 96, 97), so is sir Palomides, simply because he refused to be baptized till he had done some noble deed (pt. ii.)—Sir T. Malory, History of Prince Arthur (1470)

Saragossa, a corruption of Caesarēa Augusta. The city was rebuilt by Augustus, and called after his name. Its former name was Salduba or Saldyva.

Saragossa (The Maid of), Augustina Zaragoza or Saragoza, who, in 1808, when the city was invested by the French, mounted the battery in the place of her lover who had been shot. Lord Byron says, when he was at Seville, "the maid" used to walk daily on the Prado, decorated with medals and orders, by command of the junta—Southeys, History of the Peninsular War (1832)

Her lover sinks—she sheds no ill timed tear
Her chief is slain—she fills his fatal post
Her fellows flee—she checks their base career
The foe retires—she heads the rallying host.

Sardanapalus, king of Nineveh and Assyria, noted for his luxury and voluptuousness. Arbaces the Mede conspired against him, and defeated him, whereupon his favourite slave Myrra induced him to immolate himself on a funeral pile. The beautiful slave, having set fire to the pile, jumped into the blazing mass, and was burnt to death with the king her master (B.C. 817)—Byron, Sardanapalus (1819)

Sardanapalus of China (The), Cheo-tsin, who shut himself up in his palace with his queen, and then set fire to the building, that he might not fall into the hands of Woo-wong (B.C. 1154-1122)

(Cheo-tsin invented the chopsticks, and Woo-wong founded the Tchow dynasty.)

Sardanapalus of Germany (The), Wenceslas VI (or IV) king of Bohemia and emperor of Germany (1359, 1378-1419)

Sardoin Herb (The), the herba Sardonia, so called from Sardis, in Asia Minor. It is so acrid as to produce a convulsive spasm of the face resembling a grin. Phineas Fletcher says the device on the shield of Flattery is

The Sardonian herb, the word [motto] 'I please in killing.'

The Purple Island VIII (1633)

Sardonian Smile or Grin, a smile of contempt. Byron expresses it when he says "There was a laughing devil in his sneer."

But when the villain saw her so afraid,
He ran with guileful words her to persuade
To banish fear, and with Sardonian smile
Laughing at her his false intent to shade.

Spenser Fairy Queen v 9 (1590)

Sarmat'ia, Poland, the country of the Sarmatæ. In 1795 Poland was partitioned between Russia, Prussia, and Austria.

Oh bloodiest picture in the book of Time!
Sarmat'ia fell unwere, without a crime,
Found not a generous friend, a pitying foe
Strength in her arm, nor mercy in her bow.

Campbell's Pleasures of Hope I. (1793)

Sar'ra (Grain of), Tyrian dye, so called from sarra or sar, the fish whose blood the men of Tyre used in their purple dye—Virgil, Georgics, ii 506.

A military vest of purple
Livelier than the grain
Of Sarra, worn by kings and heroes old
In time of truce.

Milton, Paradise Lost xi 243 (1665)

Sarsar, the icy wind of death, called in Vathek "Sansar."

The Sansar from its womb went forth
The icy wind of death.

Southey Thalaba the Destroyer I. 44 (1797)

Sassenach, a Saxon, an Englishman (Welsh, sacsony adj. and sacsonial noun.)

I would if I thought I'd be able to catch some of the Sassenachs in London.—Very Far West Indeed

Satan, according to the Talmud, was once an archangel, but was cast out of heaven with one-third of the celestial host for refusing to do reverence to Adam.

In mediæval mythology, Satan holds the fifth rank of the nine demoniacal orders.

Johan Wier, in his De Præstigiis Daemonum (1564), makes Beelzebub the sovereign of hell, and Satan leader of the opposition.

In legendary lore, Satan is drawn with horns and a tail, saucer eyes, and claws, but Milton makes him a proud, selfish, ambitious chief, of gigantic size, beautiful, daring, and commanding. He declares his opinion that "tis better to reign in hell than serve in heaven." Defoe has written a Political History of the Devil (1726).

Satan, according to Milton, monarch of hell. His chief lords are Beelzebub, Moloch, Chemos, Thammuz, Dagon, Rimmon, and Belial. His standard-bearer, Azazel.

He [Satan], above the rest
In shape and gesture proudly eminent,
Stood like a tower. His form had not yet lost
All her original brightness, nor appeared
Less than archangel ruined, and the excess
Of glory obscured, but his face
Deep scars of thunder had intrenched, and care
Eat on his faded cheek, cruel his eye, but cast
Signs of remorse.

Milton, Paradise Lost I. 539 etc. (1665)

* * The word Satan means "enemy," hence Milton says

To whom the arch-enemy,
In heaven called Satan.

Paradise Lost I. 81 (1665)

Satanic School (The), a class of writers in the earlier part of the nineteenth century, who showed a scorn for all moral rules, and the generally received dogmas of the Christian religion. The most eminent English writers of this school were Bulwer (afterwards Lord Lytton), Byron, Moore, and P. B. Shelley. Of French writers Paul de Kock, Rousseau, George Sand, and Victor Hugo.

Immoral writers, men of diseased hearts and depraved imaginations who (forming a system of opinions to suit their own unhappy course of conduct) have rebelled against the holiest ordinances of human society and hating revelation which they try in vain to disbelieve labour to make others as miserable as themselves, by infecting them with a moral virus that eats into their soul. The school which they have set up may properly be called The Satanic School.—Southey's Vision of Judgment (preface 1822)

Satire (Father of), Archilochos of Paros (B.C. seventh century).

Satire (Father of French), Mathurin Regnier (1573-1613).

Satire (Father of Roman), Lucilius (B.C. 148-103).

Satiromastix or The Intrussing of the Humorous Poet, a comedy by Thomas Dekker (1602). Ben Jonson, in 1601, had attacked Dekker in The Poetaster, where he calls himself "Horace," and Dekker "Crispinus." Next year (1602), Dekker replied with spirit to this attack, in a comedy entitled Satiromastix, where Jonson is called "Horace, junior."

Saturday. To the following English sovereigns from the establishment of the Tudor dynasty, Saturday has proved a fatal day—

HENRY VII. died Saturday, April 21, 1509.

GEORGE II. died Saturday, October 25, 1760.

GEORGE III. died Saturday, January 29, 1820, but of his fifteen children only three died on a Saturday.

GEORGE IV. died Saturday, June 26, 1830, but the princess Charlotte died on a Tuesday.

PRINCE ALBERT died Saturday, December 14, 1861. The duchess of Kent and the princess Alice also died on a Saturday.

 William III, Anne, and George I all died on a Sunday, William IV on a Tuesday.

Saturn, son of Heaven and Earth. He always swallowed his children immediately they were born, till his wife Rhea, not liking to see all her children perish, concealed from him the birth of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, and gave her husband large stones instead, which he swallowed without knowing the difference.

Much as old Saturn ate his progeny
For when his pious consort gave him stones
In lieu of sons, of these he made no bones.
Byron, Don Juan, xlv 1 (1824)

Saturn, an evil and malignant planet.

He is a genius full of gall, an author born under the planet Saturn, a malicious mortal, whose pleasure consists in hating all the world.—Lesage, Gil Blas v 12 (1734)

The children born under the said Saturne shall be great janglesters and chydiers, and they will never forgive you till they be revenged of their quarrell.—Pitholomies, Compost

Satyr. T. Woolner calls Charles II "Charles the Satyr."

Next fared Charles Satyr's saturnalia
Of lady nymphs.

My Beautiful Lady

 The most famous statue of the satyrs is that by Praxiteles of Athens, in the fourth century.

Satyrane (Sir), a blunt but noble knight, who helps Una to escape from the fauns and satyrs.—Spenser, Faery Queen, 1 (1590)

And passion erst unknown could gain
The breast of blunt sir Satyrane

Sir W. Scott.

 "Sir Satyrane" is meant for sir John Perrot, a natural son of Henry VIII, and lord deputy of Ireland from 1583 to 1588, but in 1590 he was in prison in the Tower for treason, and was beheaded in 1592.

Satyr'con, a comic romance in Latin, by Petronius Arbiter, in the first century. Very gross, but showing great power, beauty, and skill.

Saul, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Oliver Cromwell. As Saul persecuted David, he drove him from Jerusalem, so Cromwell drove Charles II and drove him from England.

ere Saul they chose,
King and God they durst depose.
Pl. L. 6231

 This was the "divine right" of kings.

Saunders, groom of sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak.—Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

Saunders (Richard), the pseudonym of Dr. Franklin, adopted in Poor Richard's Almanac, begun in 1732.

Saunders Sweepclean, a king's messenger at Knockwinnock Castle.—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary (time, George III.)

Saunderson (Saunders), butler, etc., to Mr. Cosmo Comynne Bradwardine, baron of Bradwardine and Tully Veolan.—Sir W. Scott, Waverley (time, George II.)

Saurid, king of Egypt, say the Cop-tites (2 syl), built the pyramids 800 years before the Flood, and, according to the same authority, the following inscription was engraved upon one of them—

I king Saurid built the pyramids and finished them in six years. He that comes after me let him destroy them in 600 if he can. I also covered them with satin and let him cover them with mummy.—Graeves, Pyramidographia (seventeenth century).

Saut de l'Allemand (Le), "du lit à la table, et de la table au lit."

Of the gods I but ask
That my life, like the Leap of the German may be Du lit à la table, de la table au lit.
T. Moore The Judge Family in Paris viii. (1818)

Savage (Captain), a naval commander.—Captain Marryat, Peter Simple (1833).

Sav'II, steward to the elder Ioveless.—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Scornful Lady (1616).

Savile Row (London). So called from Dorothy Savile the great heiress, who became, by marriage, countess of Burlington and Cork. (See CINCINNATI STREET, p. 197.)

Sav'ille (2 syl), the friend of Dorcourt. He saves lady Frances Touchwood from Courtall, and frustrates his infamous designs on the lady's honour.—Mrs. Cowley, The Belle's Stratagem (1780).

Saville (Lord), a young nobleman with Chusinch (emissary of Charles II).—Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

Saviour of Rome. C. Marius was so called after the overthrow of the Cimbri, July 30, n.c. 101.

Saviour of the Nations. So the duke of Wellington was termed after the overthrow of Bonaparte (1769-1852)

Oh Wellington called 'Saviour of the Nations'—
Byron Don Juan l. 5 (18.4)

Savoy (The), a precinct of the Strand (London), in which the Savoy Palace stood. So called from Peter earl of Savoy, uncle of queen Eleanor the wife of Henry III. Jean le Bon of France, when captive of the Black Prince, was lodged in the Savoy Palace (1356-9). The old palace was burnt down by the rebels under Wat Tyler in 1381. Henry VII rebuilt it in 1505. St Mary le Savoy, or the "Chapel of St John," still stands in the precinct.

Sawney, a corruption of Sandie, a contracted form of Alexander. Sawney means a Scotchman, as David a Welshman, John Bull an Englishman, cousin Michael a German, brother Jonathan a native of the United States of North America, Micare a Frenchman, Colin Tampon a Swiss, and so on.

Sawyer (Bob), a dissipated, struggling young medical practitioner, who tries to establish a practice at Bristol, but without success. Sam Weller calls him "Mr Sawbones"—C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836).

Saxifrage (3 syl.) So called from its virtues as a lithontriptic.

So saxifrage is good, and hart-tongue for the stone
With agrimony and it all herb we call St. John.
Drayton Polyolbion, xiii (1613)

Saxon. Higden derives this word from the Latin saxum, "a stone." This reminds one of Lloyd's derivation of "Ireland," "the land of Ire," and Duncange's "Saracen" from "Sarah, Abraham's wife." Of a similar character are "Albion" from albus, "white," "Picts" from picus, "painted," "Devonshire" from Debon's share, "Isle of Wight" from "Wightgar, son of Cerdic," "Britain" from Brutus, a descendant of Antas, "Scotland" from sotos, "darkness," "Gaul" (the French) from gallus, "a cock," "Dublin" from duib[un] lin[teun], "questionable linen," and so on.

Men of that countree ben more lyghter and stronger on the see than other commercors or theives of the see and ben called Saxones, of saxum, a stone for they ben as hard as stones.—Iolyconicon l. 26 (1357)

Saxon, Drayton says, is so called from an instrument of war called by the Germans handseax. The seax was a short, crooked sword,

And of those crooked skyns they used in war to bear
Which in their thundering tongue the Germans handseax name
They saxons first were named.

Polyolbion iv (1612).

Saxon Duke (The), mentioned by Butler in his Hudibras, was John Frederick duke of Saxony, of whom Charles V said, "Never saw I such a swine before."

Say and Mean. You speak h/c a Laminal, you say one thing and mean another. The Basque *Laminal*s ("fairies") always say exactly the contrary to what they mean.

She said to her I must go from home but your work is in the kitchen smash the pitcher break all the plates beat the children give them their breakfast by themselves smudge their faces and rumple well their hair? When the Laminal returned home she asked the girl which she preferred—a bag of charcoal or a bag of gold a beautiful star or a donkey's tail? The girl made answer A bag of charcoal and a donkey's tail.
Whereupon the fairy gave her a bag of gold and a beautiful star.—Percy W. Webster Basque Legends 53
(1876)

Sboga (Jean), the hero of a romance by C. Nodier (1818), the leader of a bandit, in the spirit of Lord Byron's Corsair and Lara.

Scadder (General), agent in the office of the "Eden Settlement." His peculiarity consisted in the two distinct expressions of his profile, for "one side seemed to be listening to what the other side was doing"—C Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1841).

Scalds, court poets and chroniclers of the ancient Scandinavians. They resided at court, were attached to the royal suite, and attended the king in all his wars. They also acted as ambassadors between hostile tribes, and their persons were held sacred. These bards celebrated in song the gods, the kings of Norway, and national heroes. Their lays or ryses were compiled in the eleventh century by Semund Sigfusson, a priest and scald of Iceland, and the compilation is called the Elder or Rhythmical Ldda.

Scallop-Shell (The). Every one knows that St James's pilgrims are distinguished by scallop-shells, but it is a blunder to suppose that other pilgrims are privileged to wear them. Three of the popes have, by their bulls, distinctly confirmed this right to the Compostella pilgrim alone—viz, pope Alexander III, pope Gregory IX, and pope Clement V.

Now, the scallop or scallop is a shell-fish, like an oyster or large cockle, but Gwillim tells us what ignorant zoologists have omitted to mention, that the bivalve is "engendered solely of dew and air. It has no blood at all, yet no food that man eats turns so soon into life-blood as the scallop"—Display of Heraldry, 171

Scallop-shells used by Pilgrims The reason why the scallop-shell is used by pilgrims is not generally known. The legend is this: When the marble ship which bore the headless body of St. James approached Bouzas, in Portugal, it happened to be the wedding day of the chief magnate of the village, and while the bridal party was at sport, the horse of the bridegroom became unmanageable, and plunged into the sea. The ship passed over the horse and its rider, and pursued its onward course, when, to the amazement of all, the horse and its rider emerged from the water uninjured, and the cloak of the rider was thickly covered with scallop-shells. All were dumfounded, and knew not what to make of these marvels, but a voice from heaven exclaimed, "It is the will of God that all who henceforth make their vows to St. James, and go on pilgrimage, shall take with them scallop-shells, and all who do so shall be remembered in the day of judgment." On hearing this, the lord of the village, with the bride and bridegroom, were duly baptized, and Bouzas became a Christian Church—Sanctoral Portugues (copied into the Breviaries of Alcobaca and St. Cucufate)

Scalping (Rules for) The Cheyennes, in scalping, remove from the part just over the left ear, a piece of skin not larger than a silver dollar. The Arapahoes take a similar piece from the region of the right ear. Others take the entire skin from the crown of the head, the forehead, or the nape of the neck. The Utes take the entire scalp from ear to ear, and from the forehead to the nape of the neck.

Scandal, a male character in Love for Love, by Congreve (1695)

Scandal (School for), a comedy by Sheridan (1777)

Scanderbeg So George Castriota, an Albanian hero, was called Amurath II gave him the command of 5000 men, and such was his daring and success, that he was called Skander (Alexander). In the battle of Morava (1443), he deserted Amurath, and, joining the Albanians, won several battles over the Turks. At the instigation of Pius II he headed a crusade against them, but died of a fever, before Mahomet II arrived to oppose him (1404-1467) (Beg or Bey is the Turkish for "prince")

Scanderbeg's sword needs Scanderbeg's arm Mahomet II "the Great" requested to see the scimitar which George Castriota used so successfully against the Ottomans in 1461. Being shown it, and wholly unable to draw it, he pronounced the weapon to be a hoax, but received for answer, "Scanderbeg's sword needs Scanderbeg's arm to wield it."

The Greeks had a similar saying, "None but Ulysses can draw Ulysses's bow." Robin Hood's bow needed Robin Hood's arm to draw it, and hence the proverb, "Many talk of Robin Hood that never shot in his bow."

Scandinavia, Sweden and Norway, or Sweden, Norway, and Denmark.

Scapegoat (The), a farce by John Poole. Ignatius Polyglot, a learned pundit, master of seventeen languages, is the tutor of Charles Eustace, aged 24 years. Charles has been clandestinely married for four years, and has a little son, named Frederick. Circumstances have occurred which render the concealment of this marriage no longer decorous or possible, so he breaks it to his tutor, and conceals his young wife for the nonce in Polyglot's private room. Here she is detected by the housemaid, Molly Maggs, who tells her master, and old Eustace says, the only reparation a man can make in such circumstances is to marry the girl at once. "Just so," says the tutor. "Your son is the husband, and he is willing at once to acknowledge his wife and infant son."

Scapin, valet of Léandre son of seigneur Géronte (See FOURBERIES)—Molière, Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671)

J'ai sans doute reçu du ciel un génie assez beau pour toutes les fabricques de ces gentillesces d'esprit de ces galanteries ingénieuses, à qui le vulgaire ignorant donne le nom de fourberies et je puis dire sans vanité qu'on ne guère vu d'homme qui fût plus habile ouvrier de ressorts et d'intrigues qui ait acquis plus de gloire que moi dans ce noble métier —Molière, Les Fourberies de Scapin, I. 2 (1671)

(Otway has made an English version of this play, called The Cheats of Scapin, in which Leandro is Anglicized into "Leander," Géronte is called "Gripe," and his friend Argante father of Zerbinette is called "Thrifty" father of "Lucia")

Scapino, the cunning, knavish servant of Gratiano the loquacious and pedantic Bolognese doctor —Italian Mask

Scar'amousch, a braggart and fool, most valiant in words, but constantly being drubbed by Harlequin. Scar'amousch is a common character in Italian farce, originally meant in ridicule of the Spanish don, and therefore dressed in Spanish costume. Our clown is an imbecile old idiot, and wholly unlike the dashing poltroon of Italian pantomime. The best "Scaramouches" that ever lived were Tiberio Fiorelli, a Neapolitan (born 1603), and Gaudin (eighteenth century)

Scarborough Warning (4), a warning given too late to be taken advantage of. Fuller says the allusion is to an event which occurred in 1557, when Thomas Stafford seized upon Scarborough Castle, before the townsmen had any notice of his approach. Heywood says a "Scarborough warning" resembles what is now called Lynch law, punished first, and warned afterwards. Another solution is this. If ships passed the castle without saluting it by striking sail, it was customary to fire into them a shotted gun, by way of warning.

Do rarely seldom, and never for much
Or Scarborough warning as ill I believe
When ("Sir I am tye") gets hold of thy sleeve

Scathelocke (2 syl) or Scadlock, one of the companions of Robin Hood. Either the brother of Will Scarlet or another spelling of the name (See SCARLET) Scavenger's Daughter (The), an instrument of torture, invented by Sir William Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Henry VIII. "Scavenger" is a corruption of Skevington.

To kiss the scavenger's daughter, to suffer punishment by this instrument of torture, to be beheaded by a guillotine or some similar instrument

Seazon, plu Seazon'tes (3 syl), a lame iambic metre, the last being a spondee or trochee instead of an iambus (Greek, stazo, "to halt, to hobble"), as

1. Quicumque regno sedit, et magna potestas.
2. O Musa, gressum quo volens trahis claudum.

Or in English

1. A little onward lend thy guiding hand
2. He unsuspecting led him, when Samson

Sceaf [Sheef], one of the ancestors of Woden. So called because in infancy he was laid on a wheatsheaf, and cast adrift in a boat, the boat stranded on the shores of Sleswig, and the infant, being considered a gift from the gods, was brought up for a future king — Beowulf (an Anglo-Saxon epic, sixth century)

Scepticism (Father of Modern), Pierre Bayle (1647-1706)

Schacabac, "the hare-lipped," a man reduced to the point of starvation, invited to a feast by the rich Barmecide. Instead of victuals and drink, the rich man set before his guest empty dishes and empty glasses, pretending to enjoy the imaginary foods and drinks. Schacabac entered into the spirit of the joke, and did the same. He washed in imaginary water, ate of the imaginary delicacies, and praised the imaginary wines. Barmecide was so delighted with his guest, that he ordered in a substantial meal, of which he made Schacabae a most welcome partaker—Arabian Nights ("The Barbers Sixth Brother") (See SHACCABAC)

Schah'riah, sultan of Persia His wife being unfaithful, and his brothers wife too, Sebahriah imagined that no woman was virtuous He resolved, therefore, to marry a fresh wife every night, and to have her strangled at daybreak Scheherazade, the vizier's daughter, married him notwithstanding, and contrived, an hour before daybreak, to begin a story to her sister in the sultan's hearing, always breaking off before the story was finished The sultan got interested in these tales, and, after a thousand and one nights, revoked his decree, and found in Scheherazade a faithful, intelligent, and loving wife—Arabian Nights' Entertainments

Schah'zaman, sultan of the "Island of the Children of Khal'edan," situate in the open sea, some twenty days sail from the coast of Persia This sultan had a son, an only child, named Camaral'zaman, the most beautiful of mortals Camaral'zaman married Badoura the most beautiful of women, the only daughter of Gaour (2 syl) emperor of China—Arabian Nights ("Camaral'zaman and Badoura")

Scharbar (2 syl), brother of the fairy Pari-Banon He was only eighteen inches in height, and had a huge hump both before and behind His beard, though thirty feet long, never touched the ground, but projected forwards His moustaches went back to his ears, and his little pig's eyes were buried in his enormous head He wore a conical hat, and carried for quarter-staff an iron bar of 500 lbs weight at least.—Arabian Nights ("Ahmed and Pari-Banou")

Schamir (The), that instrument or agent with which Solomon wrought the stones of the Temple, being forbidden to use any metal instrument for the purpose Some say the Schamir was a worm, some that it was a stone, some that it was "a creature no bigger than a barleycorn, which nothing could resist."

Scheherazade [Sha ha' ra zah' de], the hypothetical relater of the stories in the Arabian Nights She was the elder daughter of the vizier of Persia The sultan Sebahriah exasperated at the infidelity of his wife, came to the hasty conclusion that no woman could be faithful, so he determined to marry a new wife every night, and strangle her at daybreak

Scheherazade, wishing to free Persia of this disgrace, requested to be made the sultan's wife, and succeeded in her wish She was young and beautiful, of great courage and ready wit, well read, had an excellent memory, knew history, philosophy, and medicine, was besides a good poet, musician, and dancer Scheherazade obtained permission of the sultan for her younger sister, Dinarzade, to sleep in the same chamber, and instructed her to say, one hour before daybreak, "Sister, relate to me one of those delightful stories which you know, as this will be the last time" Scheherazade then told the sultan (under pretence of speaking to her sister) a story, but always contrived to break off before the story was finished The sultan, in order to hear the end of the story, spared her life till the next night. This went on for a thousand and one nights, when the sultan's resentment was worn out, and his admiration of his sultana was so great that he revoked his decree.—Arabian Nights Entertainments (See MORABBAK)

Roused like the sultana Scheherazade and forced into a story—C Dickens, David Copperfield d (1840)

Schemseddin Mohammed, elder son of the vizier of Egypt, and brother of Noureddin Ali He quarrelled with his brother on the subject of their two children's hypothetical marriage, but the brothers were not yet married, and children "were only in supposition" Noureddin Ali quitted Cairo, and travelled to Basora, where he married the vizier's daughter, and on the very same day Schemseddin married the daughter of one of the chief grandees of Cairo On one and the same day a daughter was born to Schemseddin and a son to his brother Nonreddin Ali When Schemseddin's daughter was 20 years old, the sultan asked her in marriage, but the vizier told him she was betrothed to his brother's son, Bedreddin Ali At this reply, the sultan, in anger, swore she should be given in marriage to the "ugliest of his slaves," and accordingly betrothed her to Hunchback a groom, both ugly and deformed By a fairy trick, Bedreddin Ali was substituted for the groom, but at daybreak was conveyed to Damascus Here he turned pastry-cook, and was discovered by his mother by his cheese-cakes Being restored to his country and his wife, he ended his life happily—Arabian Nights ("Nonreddin Ali," etc) (See CHEESE-CAKES, p 189)

Sciol'to (3 syl'), a proud Genoese nobleman, the father of Calista Calista was the bride of Altamont, a young man proud and fond of her, but it was discovered on the wedding day that she had been seduced by Lothario This led to a series of calamities (1) Lothario was killed in a duel by Altamont, (2) a street riot was created, in which Sciolto received his death-wound, and (3) Calista stabbed herself — N Rowe, The Fair Penitent (1703)

(In Italian, Sciolto forms but two syllables, but Rowe has made it three in every case)

Scipio "dismissed the Iberian maid" (Milton, Paradise Regained, ii) The poet refers to the tale of Scipio's restoring a captive princess to her lover Allucius, and giving to her, as a wedding present, the money of her ransom (See CONTINENCE, pp 209, 210)

During his command in Spain a circumstance occurred which contributed more to his fame and glory than all his military exploits. At the taking of New Carthage a lady of extraordinary beauty was brought to Scipio who found himself greatly affected by her charms. Under standing however that she was betrothed to a Celtiberian prince named Allucius, he resolved to conquer his ruling passion and not her to her lover without recompense. A silver shield, on which this interesting event is depicted was found in the river Rhone by some fishermen in the seventeenth century — Goldsmith History of Rome xiv 3 (Whittaker's Improved edition contains a fac simile of the shield on p 215)

Scipio, son of the gipsy woman Coscolina and the soldier Torrihu Scipio Scipio becomes the secretary of Gil Blas, and settles down with him at "the castle of Liras" His character and adventures are very similar to those of Gil Blas himself, but he never rises to the same level Scipio begins by being a rogue, who pilfered and plundered all who employed him, but in the service of Gil Blas he was a model of fidelity and integrity — Lesage, Gil Blas (1715)

Sciro'nian Rocks, between Meg'ara and Corinth So called because the bones of Sciron, the robber of Attica, were changed into these rocks, when Theseus (2 syl) hurled him from a cliff into the sea It was from these rocks that Ino cast herself into the Corinthian bay — Greek Fable

Scirum The men of Scirum used to shoot against the stars

Like men of wit bereaven
Which bowls and shoots against the lights of heaven.

Scobellum, a very fruitful land, the inhabitants of which were changed into beasts by the vengeance of the gods The drunkards were turned into swine, the lechers into goats, the proud into peacocks, shrews into magpies, gamblers into asses, musicians into song-birds, the envious into dogs, idle women into milch cows, jesters into monks, dancers into squirrels, and misers into moles

They exceeded cannibals in cruelty the Persians in pride the Egyptians in luxury the Cretons in lying the Germans in drunkenness, and all in wickedness. — J. Ridley (R. Johnson), The Seven Champions of Christendom, lib 10 (1617)

Scogan (Henry), M A, a poet, contemporary with Chaucer He lived in the reigns of Richard II, Henry IV, and probably Henry V Among the gentry who had letters of protection to attend Richard II in his expedition into Ireland, in 1399, is "Henricus Scogan, Armiger" — Tyrwhitt's Chaucer, v 15 (1773)

Scogan? What was he?

Oh a fine gentleman and a master of arts
Of Henry the Fourth's time that made disguises
For the king's sons, and writ in ballad royal Daintily well

Ben Jonson The Fortunate Isles (1625)

Scogan (John), the favourite jester and buffoon of Edward IV "Seogan's jests" were published by Andrew Borde, a physician in the reign of Henry VIII

The same sir John [Falstaff] the very same. I saw him break Scogan's head at the court-gate, when he was a crack not thus high. — Shakespeare 2 Henry IV act iii sc. 2

* * Shakespeare has confounded Henry Scogan, M A, the poet, who lived in the reign of Henry IV, with John Seogan the jester, who lived about a century later, in the reign of Edward IV, and, of course, sir John Falstaff could not have known him when "he was a mere crack"

Seogan's Jest Scogan and some companions, being in lack of money, agreed to the following trick — A peasant, driving sheep, was accosted by one of the accomplices, who laid a wager that his sheep were hogs, and agreed to abide by the decision of the first person they met This, of course, was Seogan, who instantly gave judgment against the herdsman

A similar joke is related in the Hitopadesa, an abridged version of Pilpay's Fables In this case, the "peasant" is represented by a Brahmin carrying a goat, and the joke was to persuade the Brahmin that he was carrying a dog "How is this, friend," says one, "that you, a Brahmin, carry on your back such an unclean animal as a dog?" "It is not a dog," says the Brahmin, "but a goat," and trudged on. Presently another made the same remark, and the Brahmin, beginning to doubt, took down the goat to look at it. Convinced that the creature was really a goat, he went on, when presently a third made the same remark. The Brahmin, now fully persuaded that his eyes were befooling him, threw down the goat and went away without it, whereupon the three companions took possession of it and cooked it.

In Thyl Eulenspiegel we have a similar hoax. Eulenspiegel sees a man with a piece of green cloth, which he resolves to obtain. He employs two confederates, both priests. Says Eulenspiegel to the man, "What a famous piece of blue cloth! Where did you get it?" "Blue, you fool! why, it is green." After a short contention, a bet is made, and the question in dispute is referred to the first comer. This was a confederate, and he at once decided that the cloth was blue. "You are both in the same boat," says the man, "which I will prove by the priest yonder." The question being put to the priest, is decided against the man, and the three rogues divide the cloth amongst them.

Another version is in novel 8 of Fortunio. The joke was that certain kids he had for sale were capons.—See Dunlop, History of Fiction, viii art "Ser Giovanni."

Scone [Shoon], a palladium stone. It was erected in Icolmkill for the coronation of Fergus Eric, and was called the Lia-Fail of Ireland. Fergus the son of Fergus Eric, who led the Dalriads to Argyllshire, removed it to Scone, and Edward I took it to London. It still remains in Westminster Abbey, where it forms the support of Edward the Confessor's chair, which forms the coronation chair of the British monarchs.

Scotch Guards, in the service of the French kings, were called his garde du corps. The origin of the guard was this. When St Louis entered upon his first crusade, he was twice saved from death by the valour of a small band of Scotch auxiliaries under the commands of the earls of March and Dunbar, Walter Stewart, and sir David Lindsay. In gratitude thereof, it was resolved that "a standing guard of Scotchmen, recommended by the king of Scotland, should evermore form the body-guard of the king of France." This decree remained in force for five centuries.—Grant, The Scottish Cavalier, xx.

Scotia, Scotland, sometimes called "Scotia Minor." The Venerable Bede tells us that Scotland was called Caledonia till A.D. 558, when it was invaded by a tribe from Ireland, and its name changed to Scotia.

Scotia Magna or Major, Ireland.

Scotland. So called, according to legend, from Scota, daughter of Pharaoh. What gives this legend especial interest is, that when Edward I laid claim to the country as a fief of England, he pleaded that Brute the British king, in the days of Eli and Sammel, had conquered it. The Scotch, in their defence, pleaded their independence in virtue of descent from Scota, daughter of Pharaoh. This is not fable, but sober history.—Rymer, Fœdera, I. ii (1703).

Scotland Yard (London). So called from a palace which stood there for the reception of the king of Scotland when he came to England to pay homage to his over-lord the king of England.

Scotland a Fief of England. When Edward I laid claim to Scotland as a fief of the English crown, his great plea was that it was awarded to Adelstan by direct miracle, and, therefore, could never be alienated. His advocates seriously read from The Life and Miracles of St John of Beverley this extract. Adelstan went to drive back the Scotch, who had crossed the border, and, on reaching the Tyne, St John of Beverley appeared to him, and bade him cross the river at daybreak. Adelstan obeyed, and reduced the whole kingdom to submission. On reaching Dunbar, in the return march, Adelstan prayed that some sign might be given, to testify to all ages that God had delivered the kingdom into his hands. Whereupon he was commanded to strike the basaltic rock with his sword. This did he, and the blade sank into the rock "as if it had been butter," cleaving it asunder for "an ell or more." As the cleft remains to the present hour, in testimon" of this miracle, why, of course, *celo Scots (scot "a wanderer, a rover"), the inhabitants of the western coast of Scotland. As this part is very hilly and barren, it is unfit for tillage, and the inhabitants used to live a roving life on the produce of the chase, their chief employment being the rearing of cattle.

The Gaelicists began divided in a two distinct nations — those on the western coast which was hilly and barren, and those towards the east where the land is fit for tillage. As the employment of the former did not fit them to one place, they removed from one head to another as suited best with their convenience or inclination, and were called by their neighbours Scots or the "wandering nation." — Illustration on the Poems of Ossian.

Scots (The Royal) The hundred curassiers, called hommes des armes, which formed the body-guard of the French king were sent to Scotland in 1633 by Louis XIII to attend the coronation of Charles I at Edinburgh. On the outbreak of the civil war, eight years afterwards, these curassiers loyally adhered to the crown, and received the title of "The Royal Scots." At the downfall of the king, the hommes des armes returned to France.

The Dunciad is, however, preceded by a Prolegomena, ascribed to Martinus Scriblerus, and contains his notes and illustrations on the poem, thus connecting this merciless satire with the original design.

Scriptores Decem, a collection of ten ancient chronicles on English history, in one vol folio, London, 1652, edited by Roger Twysden and John Selden. The volume contains (1) Simeon Dunelmensis [Simeon of Durham], Historia, (2) Johannes Hagustaldensis [John of Hexham], Historia Continuata, (3) Richardus Hagustaldensis [Richard of Hexham], De Gestis Regis Stephani, (4) Ailredus Rievallensis [Ailred of Rievall], Historia (genealogy of the kings), (5) Radulphus de Diceto [Ralph of Diceto], Abbreviationes Chronicorum and Ymagines Historiarum, (6) Johannes Brompton, Chronicon, (7) Gervasius Dorobornensis [Gervais of Dover], Chronica, etc (burning and repair of Dover Church, contentions between the monks of Canterbury and archbishop Baldwin, and lives of the archbishops of Canterbury), (8) Thomas Stubbs (a dominican), Chronica Pontificum ecc Eborac [e York], (9) Guilielmus Thorn Cantuariensis [of Canterbury], Chronica, and (10) Henricus Knighton Leicestrensis [of Leicester], Chronica. (The last three are chronicles of "pontiffs" or archbishops.)

Scriptores Quinque, better known as Scriptores Post Bedam, published at Frankfurt, 1601, in one vol folio, and containing (1) Wilhelm Malmesburiensis, De Gestis Regum Anglorum, Historia Novella, and De Gestis Pontificum Anglorum, (2) Henry Huntindoniensis, Historia, (3) Roger Hoveden [Hoveden], Annales, (4) Ethelwerd, Chronica, and (5) Ingulphus Croylandensis [of Croyland], Historia.

Scriptores Tres, three "hypothetical" writers on ancient history, which Dr Bertram professed to have discovered between the years 1747 and 1757. They are called Richardus Cornensis [of Cirencester], De Situ Britannia, Gildas Badoniensis, and Nennius Banchoensis [of Bangor]. Scroggens (Giles), a peasant, who courted Molly Brown, but died just before the wedding day. Molly cried and cried for him, till she cried herself fast asleep. Fancying that she saw Giles Scroggens's ghost standing at her bedside, she exclaimed in terror, "What do you want?" "You for to come for to go along with me," replied the ghost. "I ben't dead, you fool!" said Molly, but the ghost rejoined, "Why, that's no rule." Then, clasping her round the waist, he exclaimed, "Come, come with me, ere morning beam." "I won't!" shrieked Molly and woke to find "'twas nothing but a dream"—A Comic Ballad

Scroggs (Sir William), one of the judges—Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Scrooge (Ebenezer), partner, executor, and heir of old Jacob Marley, stock-broker. When first introduced, he is "a squeezing, grasping, covetous old hunk, sharp and hard as a flint," without one particle of sympathy, loving no one, and by none beloved. On Christmas Day, Ebenezer Scrooge sees three ghosts. The Ghost of Christmas Past, the Ghost of Christmas Present, and the Ghost of Christmas To-come. The first takes him back to his young life, shows him what Christmas was to him when a schoolboy, and when he was an apprentice, reminds him of his courting a young girl, whom he forsook as he grew rich, and shows him that sweetheart of his young days married to another, and the mother of a happy family. The second ghost shows him the joyous home of his clerk Bob Cratchit, who has nine people to keep on 10s a week, and yet could find wherewithal to make merry on this day, it also shows him the family of his nephew, and of others. The third ghost shows him what would be his lot if he died as he then was, the prey of harpies, the jest of his friends on 'Change, the world's unearned-for wail. These visions wholly change his nature, and he becomes benevolent, charitable, and cheerful, loving all, and by all beloved—C Dickens, A Christmas Carol (in five staves, 1843)

Scrow, the clerk of lawyer Glossin—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Scrub, a man-of-all-work to lady Bountiful. He describes his duties thus

Of a Monday I drive the coach, of a Tuesday I drive the plough, on Wednesday I follow the hounds, on Thursday I dun the tenants, on Friday I go to market, on Saturday

I draw warrants and on Sunday I draw beer—Geo Farquhar The Beaux Stratagem ill. 4 (1707)

One day when Weston [1727-1778] was announced to play "Scrub" he sent to request a loan of money from Garrick which was refused, whereupon Weston did not put in his appearance in the green room. So Garrick came to the foot lights, and said "Ladies and gentlemen Mr Weston is not capable of appearing with your permission in his stead" "I shan bailiff now" hallooed out, "I am here but the bailiff won't let me come." The audience roared with laughter, clamoured for Weston. Insisted he should play "Scrub," and the manager was obliged to advance the loan and release the debtor—Spirit of the Public Journals (1825).

Seruple, the friend of Random. He is too honest for a rogue, and too conscientious for a rake. At Calais he met Harriet, the elder daughter of sir David Dunder of Dunder Hall, near Dover, and fell in love with her. Seruple subsequently got invited to Dunder Hall, and was told that his Harriet was to be married next day to lord Snolt, a stumpy, "gummy" fogey of five and forty. Harriet hated the idea, and agreed to elope with Seruple, but her father discovered by accident the intention, and intercepted it. However, to prevent scandal, he gave his consent to the union, and discovered that Seruple, both in family and fortune, was quite suitable for a son-in-law—G Colman, Ways and Means (1788)

Scudamour (Sir), the knight beloved by Amoret (whom Britomart delivered from Busyrane the enchanter), and whom she ultimately married. He is called Scudamour (3 syl) from [e]scu d'amour ("the shield of love"), which he carried (bk. 11. 10). This shield was hung by golden bands in the temple of Venus, and under it was written "WHOSEVER BE THIS SHIELD, FAIRE AMORET BE HIS." Sir Scudamour, determined to win the prize, had to fight with twenty combatants, overthrew them all, and the shield was his. When he saw Amoret in the company of Britomart dressed as a knight, he was racked with jealousy, and went on his wanderings, accompanied by nurse Glaucé for "his squire," but somewhat later, seeing Britomart without her helmet, he felt that his jealousy was groundless (bk. 11. 6). His tale is told by himself (bk.

Seyld, the king of Denmark preceding Beowulf. The Anglo-Saxon epic poem called Beowulf (sixth century) begins with the death of Seyld

At his appointed time, Seyld decreed very decrepitate, and went into the peace of the Lord. They bore him to the sea shore as he himself requested. There on the beach stood the ring-growed ship, the vehicle of the noble, ready to set out. They hid down the dear prince, the detributed of rings, in the bosom of the ship, the mighty one beside the mast, they set up a golden ensign high overhead. They gave him to the deep. Sad was their spirit, moanful their mood. —Kemble Beowulf (an Anglo-Saxon poem 1833)

Seylla and Charybdis. The former was a rock, in which dwelt Seylla, a hideous monster encompassed with dogs and wolves. The latter was a whirlpool, into which Charybdis was metamorphosed —Classic Table

Seythuan (That Brave), Darius the Persian. According to Herodotus, all the south-east of Europe used to be called Seythia, and Xenophon calls the dwellers south of the Caspian Sea "Seythians" also. In fact, by Seythia was meant the south of Russia and west of Asia, hence the Hungarians, a Tartar horde settled on the east coast of the Caspian, who, in 889, crossed into Europe, are spoken of as "Seythians," and lord Brooke calls the Persians "Seythians." The reference below is to the following event in Persian history. —The death of Smerdis was kept for a time a profound secret, and one of the officers about the court who resembled him, usurped the crown, calling himself brother of the late monarch. Seven of the high nobles conspired together, and slew the usurper, but it then became a question to which of the seven the crown should be offered. They did not toss for it, but they did much the same thing. They agreed to give the crown to him whose horse neighed first. Darius's horse won, and thus Darius became king of the Persian empire.

That brave Seythian
Who sung I more ~~and there~~ in his home a neighing

Seythian's Name (The) Humber or Humbert king of the Huns invaded England during the reign of Iocern, some 1000 years ago. In his flight, he was drowned in the river Abus, which has ever since been called the Humber, after "the Seythian's name" —Geoffrey, British History, ii 2 (1112), and Milton's History of England

Or Humber loud that keeps the Seythian's name.
Milton, Education Exercise (ll 27)

Sea (The Great) The Mediterranean was so called by the ancients

Sea (The Waterless) Prestor John, in his letter to Manuel Comnenus emperor of Constantinople, says that in his country there is a "waterless sea," which none have ever crossed. It consists of tumbling billows of sand, never at rest, and contains fish of most excellent flavour

Three days' journey from the coast of the Sand Sea is a mountain whence rolls down a "waterless river," consisting of small stones, which crumble into sand when they reach the "sea"

Near the Sand Sea is a fountain called Mussel, because it is contained in a basin like a mussel-shell. This is a test fountain. Those who test it, strip off their clothes, and if they are true and loyal, the water rises three times, till it covers their head

Sea-Born City (The), Venice

Sea-Captain (The), a drama by lord Lytton (1859). Norman, "the sea-captain," was the son of lady Arundel by her first husband, who was murdered. He was born three days after his father's murder, and was brought up by Onslow, a village priest. At 14 he went to sea, and became the captain of a man-of-war. Lady Arundel married again, and had another son named Percy. She wished to ignore Norman, and to settle the title and estates on Percy, but it was not to be. Norman and Percy both loved Violet, a ward of lady Arundel. Violet, however, loved Norman only. A scheme was laid to murder Norman, but failed, and at the end Norman was acknowledged by his mother, reconciled to his brother, and married to the ward.

introduced. Damon had long loved the beautiful Musidora, but met with scant encouragement. One summer's evening, he accidentally came upon her bathing, and the respectful modesty of his love so won upon the damsel that she wrote upon a tree, "Damon, the time may come when you need not fly." The whole book contains 1804 lines.

3 In "Spring," the poet describes its general features, and its influence on the vegetable and animal world. He describes a garden with its harem of flowers, a grove with its orchestra of song-birds making melody in their love, the rough world of brutes furious and fierce with their strong desire, and lastly man tempered by its insidious influence. The book contains 1178 lines.

1 In "Autumn" we are taken to the harvest-field, where the poet introduces a story similar to that of Ruth and Boaz. His Ruth he calls "Lavinia," and his Boaz "Palmer." He then describes partridge and pheasant shooting, hare and fox hunting, all of which he condemns. After luxuriating in the orchard and vineyard, he speaks of the emigration of birds, the falling of the pear and yellow leaf, and concludes with a eulogy of country life. The whole book contains 157 lines.

 It is much to be regretted that the poet's order has not been preserved. The arrangement of the seasons into Spring, Summer, Autumn, and Winter, is unnatural, and mars the harmony of the poet's plan.

Sebastian, father of Valentine and Alice — Berumont and Fletcher, Mons Thomas (1619)

Sebastian (Don), king of Portugal, is defeated in battle and taken prisoner by the Moors (1574). He is saved from death by Doria, a noble Portuguese, then a renegade in the court of the emperor of Barbary. The train being dismissed, Doria takes off his turban, assumes his Portuguese dress, and is recognized as Alonzo of Alcazar — Dryden, Don Sebastian (1690)

The quarrel and reconciliation of Sebastian and Doria (after Alonzo of Alcazar) is a mixture of comedy from a similar scene between Brutus and Cassius in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar — J. Chambers, English Literature L 349

Don Sebastian, a name of terror to Moorish children

For shall Sebastian's formidable name
Be long used to fill the crying babe
— Dryden, Don Sebastian (1693)

Sebastian I of Brazil, who fell in the battle of Alcazarquebir in 1578. The legend is that he is not dead, but is patiently biding the fulness of time, when he will return, and make Brazil the chief kingdom of the earth. (See BARBAI OSEA)

Sebastocrator (The), the chief officer of state in the empire of Greece. Same as Protoschistos — Sir W. Scott, Count Robert of Paris (time, Rufus)

Sebile (2 syl), la Dame du Lac in the romance called Perceforest. Her castle was surrounded by a river, on which rested so thick a fog that no one could see across it. Alexander the Great abode with her a fortnight to be cured of his wounds, and king Arthur was the result of this amour (vol. 12)

Secret Hill (The). Ossian said to Oscar, when he resigned to him the command of the morrow's battle, "Be thine the secret hill to-night," referring to the Gaelic custom of the commander of an army retiring to a secret hill the night before a battle, to hold communion with the ghosts of departed heroes — Ossian, Cathlin of Clutha

Secret Tribunal (The), the count of the Holy Vehme — Sir W. Scott, Anna of Geurstein (time, Edward IV)

Secrets The Depository of the Secrets of all the World was the inscription over one of the brazen portals of Fakreddin's valley — W. Beekford, Vathek (1781)

Sedgwick (Doomsday), William Sedgwick, a fanatical "prophet" in the Commonwealth, who pretended that it had been revealed to him in a vision that the day of doom was at hand

Sedillo, the licentiate with whom Gil Blas took service as a footman. Sedillo was a gouty old gourmand of 69. Being ill, he sent for Dr. Sangrado, who took from him six porringers of blood every day, and dosed him incessantly with warm water, giving him two or three pints at a time, saying, "a patient cannot be blooded too much, for it is a great error to suppose that blood is needful for the preservation of life. Warm water," he maintained, "drunk in abundance, is the true specific in all distempers." When the licentiate died under this treatment, the doctor insisted it was because his patient had neither lost blood enough nor drunk enough warm water — Lesage, Gil Blas, ii. 1, 2 (1715)

Sedley (Mr), a wealthy London stock-broker, brought to ruin by the fall of the funds just prior to the battle of Waterloo. The old merchant then tried to earn a meagre pittance by selling wine, coals, or lottery-tickets by commission, but his bad wine and cheap coals found but few customers.

Mrs Sedley, wife of Mr Sedley. A homely, kind-hearted, bonny, motherly woman in her prosperous days, but soured by adversity, and quick to take offence.

Amelia Sedley, daughter of the stock-broker, educated at Miss Pinkerton's academy, Chiswick Mall, and engaged to captain George Osborne, son of a rich London merchant. After the ruin of old Sedley, George married Amelia, and was disinherited by his father. He was adored by his young wife, but fell on the field of Waterloo. Amelia then returned to her father, and lived in great indigence, but captain Dobbin greatly loved her, and did much to relieve her worst wants. Captain Dobbin rose in his profession to the rank of colonel, and married the young widow.

Joseph Sedley, a collector, of Boggley

Wollah, a fat, sensual, conceited dandy, vain, shy, and vulgar "His excellency" fled from Brussels on the day of the battle between Napoleon and Wellington, and returned to Calcutta, where he bragged of his brave deeds, and made it appear that he was Wellington's right hand, so that he obtained the soubriquet of "Waterloo Sedley." He again returned to England, and became the "patron" of Becky Sharp (then Mrs Rawdon Crawley, but separated from her husband). This lady proved a terrible dragon, fleeced him of all his money, and in six months he died under very suspicious circumstances — Thackeray, Vanity Fair (1818)

Sedley (Sir Charles), in the court of Charles II — Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

See, the Conquering Hero Comes! This song stands at the opening of act II of Alexander the Great, a tragedy by N Lee (1678)

(Set to music by Handel, and introduced in the oratorio of Judas Maccabæus, 1713)

Seeleneooper (Captain), superintendent of the military hospital at Ryde — Sir W Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Seer (The Plough/cepsie), Andrew Jackson Davis

Segont'ari, inhabitants of parts of Hampshire and Berkshire, referred to in the Commentaries of Caesar

Seicento (3 syl), the sixteenth century of Italian notables, the period of bad taste and degenerate art. The degraded art is termed Seicentista, and the notables of the period the Seicentisti. The style of writing was inflated and bombastic, and that of art was what is termed "rococo." The chief poet was Marini (1569-1615), the chief painter Caravaggio (1569-1609), the chief sculptor Bernini (1593-1680), and the chief architect Borromini (1599-1667)

Sede, in Voltaire's tragedy of Mahomet, was the character in which Talma, the great French tragedian, made his debut in 1787

Seidel-Beckir, the most famous of all talismanists. He made three of extraordinary power viz, a little golden fish, which would fetch from the sea whatever was desired of it, a poniard, which rendered the person who bore it invisible, and all others whom he wished to be so, and a steel ring, which enabled the wearer to read the secrets of another's heart — Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales ("The Four Talismans," 1743)

Seine (1 syl), put for Paris Tennyson calls the red republicanism of Paris, "The red fool-fury of the Seine"

Setting the Seine on fire The Seine is a drag-net as well as a river. Hence drag-men are called in French les pêcheurs à la seine. "He'll never set the Thames on fire" is a similar pun, a temse being a sieve for sifting flour, as well as the river (French tamis, Italian tamiso, "a sieve," verb tamisare, "to sift") We sometimes hear of "setting the Mersey on fire," in which the pun is between the river and murehly "the devil," but the application of the "Seine" and "Mersey" is not very obvious to the idea implied in the proverb: he is so idle and lazy he will not set the temse (or sifter) on fire by hard work

Sejanus (Ælius), a minister of Tiberius, and commander of the pretorian guards. His affability made him a great favourite. In order that he might be the foremost man of Rome, all the children and grandchildren of the emperor were put to death under sundry pretences. Drusus, the son of Tiberius, then fell a victim. He next persuaded the emperor to retire, and Tiberius went to Campania, leaving to Sejanus the sole management of affairs. He now called himself emperor, but Tiberius, roused from his lethargy, accused his minister of treason. The senate condemned him to be strangled, and his remains, being treated with the grossest insolence, were kicked into the Tiber, A.D. 31. This was the subject of Ben Jonson's first historical play, entitled Sejanus (1603)

Sejja or Sejn, the record of all evil deeds, whether by men or the gnomes, kept by the recording angel. It also means that dungeon beneath the seventh earth, where Eblis and his companions are confined

Verily the register of the deeds of the wicked is surely in Sejja — Sale Al Koran lxxxiii

Selby (Captain), an officer in the guards — Sir W Scott, Feverel of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Self-Admiration Society (The) Poets Morris, Rossetti, and Swinburne Painters Madox Brown, Whistler, Burne Jones, Walter Crane, and some others

Selim, son of Abdallah, who was murdered by his brother Giasir (pacha of Abv'dos). After the death of his brother, Giasir (2 syl) took Selim under his charge and brought him up, but treated him with considerable cruelty. Giasir had a daughter named Zuleika (3 syl), with whom Selim fell in love, but Zuleika thought he was her brother. As soon as Giasir discovered the attachment of the two cousins for each other, he informed his daughter that he intended her to marry Osman Bey, but Zuleika eloped with Selim, the pacha pursued after them. Selim was shot, Zuleika killed her self, and Giasir was left childless and alone — Byron, Bride of Abydos (1810)

Selim, son of Achar. Jehanguir was called Selim before his accession to the throne. He married Nourmahal the "Light of the Haram," but a coolie's revenge put between them. One night, Nourmahal entered the sultan's banquet-room as a late player, and so charmed young Selim that he exclaimed, "If Nourmahal had so sung, I could have forgiven her!" It was enough. Nourmahal threw off her disguise, and became reconciled to her husband — F. Moore, Jalla Reo's ("Light of the Haram," 1817)

Selim, son of the Moorish king of Algier. [Horn b] Barbarossa, the Greek renegade, having made himself master of Algiers, slew the reigning king, but Selim escaped. After the lapse of seven years, he returned, under the assumed name of Achmet, and headed an uprising of the Moors. The insurgents succeeded, Barbarossa was slain, the widowed queen Zaphira was restored to her husband's throne, and Selim her son married her daughter of Barbarossa — J. Brown, Barbarossa (1712 or 1755)

Selim, friend of I-tan (the supposed son of Zunti the mandarin) — Murphy, The Orphan of China (1759)

Selima, daughter of Bajazet sultan of Turkey, in love with prince Axalla, but promised by her father in marriage to Omar. When Selima refused to marry Omar, Bajazet would have slain her, but Tamerlane commanded both Bajazet and Omar to be seized. So every obstacle was removed from the union of Selima and Axalla — N. Rowe, Tamerlane (1702)

Selima, one of the six Wise Men from the East led by the guiding star to Jesus. — Klopstock, The Messiah, 1 (1771)

Selith, one of the two guardian angels of the Virgin Mary and of John the Divine — Klopstock, The Messiah, 12 (1771)

Sollock (Cisly), a servant-girl in the service of lady and sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak — Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II.)

Solma, the royal residence of Fingal, in Morven (north-west coast of Scotland)

Solma thy halls are all nil. There is no sound in the wood of Morven — Ossian, Luthien

Selvaggio the father of sir Industry, and the hero of Thomson's Castle of Indolence

In fairy land there live I a knight of old,
Of few are stem, Selvaggio's well ye apt
A rough angel led in a robe and bell
I it wondrous poor. He neither rowed nor reaped;
Ne tress in a corner for all winter heaped
In hissing all his days away I wore—we were led by June now in summer steeped,
New a torrid July biting January sore
He fell in weeks pursued the hill and the lea
Thomson, Castle of Indolence II. 5 (1745)

Sem'ele (3 syl), ambitious of enjoying Jupiter in all his glory, perished from the sublime effulgence of the god. This is substantially the tale of the second story of F. Moore's Lores of the Angels. Laris requested her angel lover to come to her in all his angelic brightness, but was burnt to ashes as she fell into his embrace.

For mages give nought to subjects
A royal smile in gulfers a glorious rays
Like Simile would kill us with its blaze
Peter Bredar (Mr. Webster), Progress of Admiration (1871)

Sem'ida, the young man, the only son of a widow, raised from the dead by Jesus, as he was being carried from the walls of Nain. He was deeply in love with Cidli, the daughter of Jairus.

He was in the bloom of life. His hair hung in curls on his shaven sides and he appeared as beautiful as David when clothed by the stream of Bethlehem; he was ravished at the voice of God — Klopstock, The Messiah 17 (1771).

Semur'amis, queen of Assyria, wife of Nimus. She survived her husband, and reigned. The glory of her reign stands out so prominently that she quite eclipses all the monarchs of ancient Assyria. After a reign of forty-two years, she resigned the crown to her son Ninias, and took her flight to heaven in the form of a dove. Semuramis was the daughter of Derecto the fish-goddes and a Syrian youth, and, being exposed in infancy, was brought up by doves.

Semuramis of the North, Margaret, daughter of Waldemar III of Denmark. At the death of her father, she succeeded him, by the death of her husband, Haco VIII king of Norway, she succeeded to that kingdom also, and having conquered Albert of Sweden, she added Sweden to her empire. Thus was she queen of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden (1353-1412)

Semiramis of the North, Catharine of Russia, a powerful and ambitious sovereign, but licentious, sensual, and very immoral (1729-1796)

Semkail, the angel of the winds and waves

I keep the winds in awe with the hand which you see
In the air and prevent the wind Madge from coming forth
If I gave it freedom It would reduce the universe to powder With my other hand I blinder the sea from

Semo (Son of), Cuthullin general of the Irish tribes

Sempronius, one of the "friends" of Timon of Athens, and "the first man that ever received a gift from him" When Timon sent to borrow a sum of money of "his friend," he excused himself thus As Timon did not think proper to apply to me first, but asked others before he sent to me, I consider his present application an insult "Go," said he to the servant, "and tell your master

Who bites mine honour shall not know my coin"
Shakespeare Timon of Athens act III sc 3 (1600)

Sempronius, a treacherous friend of Cato while in Utica Sempronius tried to mask his treason by excessive zeal and unmeasured animosity against Cesar, with whom he was acting in alliance He loved Marcia, Cato's daughter, but his love was not honourable love, and when he attempted to carry off the lady by force, he was slain by Juba the Numidian prince — J Addison, Cato (1713)

I'll conceal
My thoughts in passion tis the surest way
I'll bellow out for Rome and for my country
And mouth at Cesar till I shake the senate
Your cold hypocrisy's a stale device
A worn-out trick.

Act I. I.

Sena'nus (St), the saint who fled to the island of Scattery, and resolved that no woman should ever step upon the isle An angel led St. Canara to the isle, but Senanus refused to admit her — T Moore, Irish Melodies ("St Senanus and the Lady," 1814)

Sen'eca (The Christian), bishop Hall of Norwich (1574-1636)

Sene'na (3 syl), a Welsh maiden in love with Car'adoc She dressed in boy's clothes, and, under the assumed name of Mervyn, became the page of the princess Goervyl, that she might follow her lover to America, when Madoc colonized Caer-Madoc Senena was promised in marriage to another, but when the wedding day arrived and all was ready, the bride was nowhere to be found

she doffed
Her bridal robes and clipt her golden locks,
And put on boy's attire thro' wood and wild
To seek her own true love and over sea,
Forsaking all for him, she followed him.
Southey Madoc ll. 23 (1804)

Sennac'herb, called by the Orientals King Moussal — D'Herbelot, Notes to the Koran (seventeenth century)

Sennamar, a very skilful architect who built at Hiram, for Nôman-al-Aôuar king of Hiram, a most magnificent palace In order that he might not build another equal or superior to it for some other monarch, Nôman cast him headlong from the highest tower of the building — D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale (1637)

* * A parallel tale is told of Neun'heid (2 syl), who employed four architects to build for him a palace in Ireland, and then, jealous lest they should build one like it or superior to it for another monarch, he had them all privately put to death — O Halloran, History of Ireland

Sensitive (Lord), a young nobleman of amorous proclivities, who marries Sabina Rosny, a French refugee, in Padua, but leaves her, more from recklessness than wickedness He comes to England and pays court to lady Ruby, a rich young widow, but lady Ruby knows of his marriage to the young French girl, and so hints at it that his lordship, who is no libertine, and has a great regard for his honour, sees that his marriage is known, and tells lady Ruby he will start without delay to Padua, and bring his young wife home This, however, was not needful, as Sabina was at the time the guest of lady Ruby She is called forth, and lord Sensitive openly avows her to be his wife — Cumberland, First Love (1796)

Sentimental Journey (The), by Laurence Sterne (1768) It was intended to be sentimental sketches of his tour through Italy in 1764, but he died soon after completing the first part The tourist lands at Calais, and the first incident is his interview with a poor monk of St. Francis, who begged alms for his consent. Sterne refused to give anything, but his heart smote him for his harshness to the meek old man. From Calus he goes to Montriul (Montreuil-sur-Mer), and thence to Nampont, near Cressy. Here occurred the incident, which is one of the most touching of all the sentimental sketches, that of "The Dead Ass." His next stage was Amiens, and thence to Paris. While looking at the Bastille, he heard a voice crying, "I can't get out, I can't get out!" He thought it was a child, but it was only a caged starling. This led him to reflect on the delights of liberty and miseries of captivity. Giving reins to his fancy, he imagined to himself a prisoner who for thirty years had been confined in a dungeon, during all which time "he had seen no sun, no moon, nor had the voice of his men breathe through his lattice." Carried away by his feelings, he burst into tears, for he "could not sustain the picture of confinement which his fancy had drawn." While at Paris, our tourist visited Versailles, and introduces an incident which he had witnessed some years previously at Rennes, in Brittany. It was that of a marquis reclaiming his sword and "patent of nobility." Any nobleman in France who engaged in trade, forfeited his rank, but there was a law in Brittany that a nobleman of reduced circumstances might deposit his sword temporarily with the local magistrate, and if better times dawned upon him, he might reclaim it. Sterne was present at one of these interesting ceremonies. A marquis had laid down his sword to mend his fortune by trade, and after a successful career at Martinico for twenty years, returned home, and reclaimed it. On receiving his deposit from the president, he drew it slowly from the scabbard, and, observing a spot of rust near the point, dropped a tear on it. As he wiped the blade lovingly, he remarked, "I shall find some other way to get it off." Returning to Paris, our tourist starts for Italy, but the book ends with his arrival at Moulins (Moulins). Some half a league from this city he encountered Maria, whose pathetic story had been told him by Mr. Shandy. She had lost her goat when Sterne saw her, but had instead a little dog named Silvio, led by a string. She was sitting under a poplar, playing on a pipe her vespers to the Virgin. Poor Maria had been crossed in love, or, to speak more strictly, the curé of Moulins had forbidden her banns, and the maiden lost her reason. Her story is exquisitely told, and Sterne says, "Could the traces be ever worn out of her brain, and those of Flizout of mine, she should not only eat of my bread and drink of my cup, but Maria should lie in my bosom, and be unto me as a daughter."

Sentinel and St. Paul's Clock (The) The sentinel condemned to death by court-martial for falling asleep on his watch, but pardoned because he affirmed that he heard St. Paul's clock strike thirteen instead of twelve, was John Hutheld, who died at the age of 102, June, 1770.

Sentry (Captain), one of the members of the club under whose auspices the Sp. culator was professedly issued.

September Massacre (The), the slaughter of loyalists confined in the Abbaye. This massacre took place in Paris between September 2 and 3, 1792, on receipt of the news of the capture of Verdun. The number of victims was not less than 1200, and some place it as high as 1000.

September the Third was Cromwell's day. On September 3, 1650, he won the battle of Dunbar. On September 3, 1651, he won the battle of Worcester. On September 3, 1658, he died.

Sorab, the Arabic word for the Fata Morgana.—See Quintus Curtius, De Rebus Alexandri, vii.

The Arabic word Sorab signifies that false appearance which in Eastern countries, is often seen in sandy plains about noon, resembling a large lake of water in motion. It is occasioned by the refraction of the sunbeams. It sometimes tempts thirsty travellers out of their way, but deceives them when they come near, either going forward or quite vanishing.—Bale. ti Kordn, xlvii. notes.

The actions of unbelievers are like the sorab of the plain: he who is thirsty takes it for water and finds it deceit.—ti Aorin.

Seraphic Doctor (The), St. Bonaventura, placed by Dante among the saints of his Paradiso (1221-1274).

Seraphic Saint (The), St. Francis d'Assisi (1182-1226).

Of all the saint, St. Francis was the most blameless and gentle.—Dean Milman.

Seraphina Arthuret (Miss), a papist. Her sister is Miss Anglicana Arthuret.—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III.).

Sera'pis, an Egyptian deity, symbolizing the Nile, and fertility in general.

Seraskier' (3 syl.), a name given by the Turks to a general of division, generally a pacha with two or three tails (Persian, seri as/ā, "bead of the army")

Three thousand Moslems perished here
And sixteen byonets pierced the scabbler
Byron Don Juan viii 51 (1844)

Serb, a Servian or native of Servia

Serbo'man Bog (The) Serbon was a lake a thousand miles in compass, between mount Ca'sius and the city of Damietta, one of the eastern mouths of the Nile. The Serbonian Bog was surrounded on all sides by hills of loose sand, and the sand, carried into it by high winds, floated on the surface, and looked like a solid mass. Herodotus (Greek History, ii 6) tells us that whole armies, deceived by the appearance, have been engulfed in the bog. (See also Diodorus Siculus, Bibliotheca Historica, i 35, and Lucan's Pharsalia, viii 539)

A gulf profound as that Serbonian Bog
Twixt Damietta (3 sp) and mount Ca'sius old,
Where armies whole have sunk,
Milton, Paradise Lost ii 592 etc. (1663)

Diodorus Siculus (Bibliotheca Historica, i 30) says "Many, missing their way, have been swallowed up in this bog, together with whole armies." Dr Smith says "When Darius Ochus was on his way to Egypt, this bog was the scene of at least a partial destruction of the Persian army." (Classical Dictionary, art "Serbonis Lacus")

Serem'nes (4 *sy*l), brother-in-law of king Sardanapallus, to whom he entrusts his signet-ring to put down the rebellion headed by Arbaces the Mede and Belshazzar the Chaldean soothsayer. Serem'nes was slain in a battle with the insurgents—Byron, Sardanapalus (1819)

Sere'na, allured by the mildness of the weather, went into the fields to gather wild flowers for a garland, when she was attacked by the Blatant Beast, who carried her off in its mouth. Her cries attracted to the spot Sir Calidore, who compelled the beast to drop its prey—Spenser, Fairy Queen, vi 3 (1596)

Serendib, now called Ceylon. When Adam and Eve were cast down from paradise, Adam fell on the isle of Serendib, and Eve near Joddah, in Arabia. After the lapse of 200 years, Adam joined Eve, and lived in Ceylon.

* * A print of Adam's foot is shown on Pico de Adam, in the island of Seren-dib or Ceylon. According to the Korān, the garden of Eden was not on our earth at all, but in the seventh heaven—Ludovico Marracci, Al Korān, 21 (1698)

Sergis (Sr), the attendant on Irena. He informs Sir Artegal that Irena is the captive of Grantorto, who has sworn to take her life within ten days, unless some knight will volunteer to be her champion, and in single combat prove her innocent of the crime laid to her charge—Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 11 (1596)

Sergius, a Nestorian monk, said to be the same as Boheira, who resided at Bosra, in Syria. This monk, we are told, helped Mahomet in writing the Korān. Some say it was Said or Idris Boheira.

Boheira's name in the books of Christians, is Sergius, —Masudi History 24 (A D 947)

Serpent (A), emblem of the tribe of Dan. In the old church at Iotness is a stone pulpit divided into compartments, containing shields decorated with the several emblems of the Jewish tribes, of which this is one.

Dan shall be a serpent by the way an adder in the path that biteth the horse's heels so that his rider shall fall backward.—Gen. xlix. 17

Serpent (African) (For Lucan's list, see under PIRANALIA)

The Serpent and Satan. There is an Arabian tradition that the devil begged all the animals, one after another, to carry him into the garden, that he might speak to Adam and Eve, but they all refused except the serpent, who took him between two of its teeth. It was then the most beautiful of all the animals, and walked upon legs and feet.—Masnér, History, 22 (A D 956)

The Serpent's Punishment The punishment of the serpent for tempting Eve was this (1) Michael was commanded to cut-off its legs, and (2) the serpent was doomed to feed on human excrements ever after

Y Eran [Dios] a la serpiente y a Michael, aquel que tiene la espada de Dios, y le dijo: "¡Esta serpiente es a serpiente, echala la primera arrastrando y cortale las piernas y el querec caminando arrastrando la vida por tierra!" Eran a Saana, el cual vino a verlo y dijo: "Porque tu serpiente has engañado a Adán, y los has hecho pecadores." Yo quiero que toda la maldad sea, y de todos sus hijos en saliendo de sus cuerpos entre por tu boca, porque en verdad ellos han pecado, y a cada uno de ellos dices: "¡Maldad!"—Cricket of Eternity

Serpent d'Isabit, an enormous monster, whose head rested on the top of the Pic du Midi de Bigorre, its body filled the whole valley of Luz, St Sauveur, and Gedres, and its tail was coiled in the hollow below the cirque of Gavarnie. It fed once in three months, and supplied itself by making a very strong inspiration of its breath, whereupon every living thing around was drawn into its maw. It was ultimately killed by making a huge bonfire, and waking it from its torpor, when it became enraged, and drawing a deep breath, drew the bonfire into its maw, and died in agony.—Rev W Webster, A Pyrenean Legend (1877)

Serpent Stone In a cave on the Mound of Mourning was a serpent which had a stone on the tail, and "whoever held this stone in one hand would have in the other as much gold as heart could desire"—The Mabonogion ("Pcredur," twelfth century)

Served My God. WOLFEY said, in his fall, "Had I but served my God with half the zeal I served my king, He would not in mine age have left me naked to mine enemies"—Shakespeare, Henry VIII act in sc 2 (1601)

SAMAH, when he was deposed from the government of Basorah by the caliph Moawiah, said, "If I had served God so well as I have served the caliph, He would never have condemned me to all eternity."

ANTONIO PEREZ, the favorite of Philip II of Spain, said, "Mon zele estoit si grand vers ces benignes puissances [i.e. Turin] qui si j'en eusse eu autant pour Dieu, je ne doute point qu'il ne m'eut deja recompensé de son paradis."

The earl of GOWRIE, when in 1584 he was led to execution, said, "If I had served God as faithfully as I have done the king [James VI], I should not have come to this end"—Spotswood, History of the Church of Scotland, 332, 333 (1653)

Service Tree A wand of the service tree has the power of renewing the virulence of an exhausted poison.—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Florina," 1682)

Ses'ame (3 syl), the talismanic word which would open or shut the door leading into the cave of the forty thieves. In order to open it, the words to be uttered were, "Open, Sesamé!" and in order to close it, "Shut, Sesamé!" Sesamé is a plant which yields an oily grain, and hence, when Cassim forgot the word, he substituted barley, but without effect

Ira. Habblerfield, coming to a small iron grain exchange some words with my companions, which produced as much effect as the "Open Sesamé!" of nursery renown.—Lord W. P. Lennox, Chlorides etc. I. 63

Opening a handkerchief in which he had a sample of sesamé he inquired of me how much a large measure of the grain was worth. I told him that according to the present price, a large measure was worth one hundred drachms of silver and he left the sesamé with me.—Arabian Nights (The Christian Merchant's Story)

Sesostrius (The Modern), Napoleon Bonaparte (1769, 1804-1815, 1821)

But what is he the modern, mightier far

Seven Sleepers (The) The tale of these sleepers is told in divers manners. The best accounts are those in the Korân, xviii, entitled, "The Cave, Revealed at Mecca," The Golden Legends, by Jacques de Voragine, the De Gloria Martyrum, 9, by Gregory of Tours, and the Oriental Tales, by comte de Caylus (1743)

Names of the Seven Sleepers Gregory of Tours says their names were Constantine, Dionysius, John, Maximian, Malchus, Martinian or Marcellin, and Serapion. In the Oriental Tales the names given are Jemlikha, Mekchulma, Mechlma, Merlma, Debermouch, Char-nouch, and the shepherd Keschetrouch. Their names are not given in the Korân

Number of the Sleepers Al Seyyd, a Jacobite Christian of Najrân, says the sleepers were only three, with their dog, others maintain that their number was five, besides the dog, but Al Beidawi, who is followed by most authorities, says they were seven, besides the dog

Duration of the Sleep The Korân says it was "300 years and nine years over," the Oriental Tales say the same, but if Gregory of Tours is followed, the duration of the sleep was barely 230 years

The Legend of the Seven Sleepers (1) According to Gregory of Tours Gregory says they were seven noble youths of Ephesus, who fled in the Decian persecution to a cave in mount Celion, the mouth of which was blocked up by stones. After 250 years they were discovered, and awoke, but died within a few days, and were taken in a large stone coffin to Marseilles. Visitors are still shown in St Victor's Church the stone coffin

If there is any truth at all in the legend, it amounts to this. In A.D. 250 some youths (three or seven) suffered martyrdom under the emperor Decius, "fell asleep in the Lord," and were buried in a cave of mount Celion. In 479 (the reign of Theodosius) their bodies were discovered, and, being consecrated as holy relics, were removed to Marseilles

(2) According to the Oriental Tales Six Grecian youths were slaves in the palace of Dakinos (Dacianus, Decius). This Dakinos had risen from low degrees to kingly honours, and gave himself out to be a god. Jemlikha was led to doubt the divinity of his master, because he was unable to keep off a fly which persistently tormented him, and being roused to reflection, came to the conclusion that there must be a god to whom both Dakinos and the fly were subject. He communicated his thoughts to his companions, and they all fled from the Ephesian court till they met the shepherd Keschetrouch, whom they converted, and who showed them a cave which no one but himself knew of. Here they fell asleep, and Dakinos, having discovered them, commanded the mouth of the cave to be closed up. Here the sleepers remained 309 years, at the expiration of which time they all awoke, but died a few hours afterwards

The Dog of the Seven Sleepers In the notes of the Korân by Sale, the dog's name is Kratim, Kratimer, or Katmir,

In the Oriental Tales it is Catmer, which looks like a clerical blunder for Catmer, only it occurs frequently. It is one of the ten animals admitted into Mahomet's paradise. The Korân tells us that the dog followed the seven young men into the cave, but they tried to drive him away, and even broke three of its legs with stones, when the dog said to them, "I love those who love God. Sleep, masters, and I will keep guard." In the Oriental Tales the dog is made to say, "You go to seek God, but am not I also a child of God?" Hearing this, the young men were so astounded, they went immediately, and carried the dog into the cave.

The Place of Sepulture of the Seven Sleepers Gregory of Tours tells us that the bodies were removed from mount Celion in a stone coffin to Marseilles. The Korân with Sale's notes informs us they were buried in the cave, and a chapel was built there to mark the site (See SLEEPER).

The Seven Sleepers turning on their sides William of Malmesbury says that Edward the Confessor, in his mind's eye, saw the seven sleepers turn from their right sides to their left, and (he adds) whenever they turn on their sides it indicates great disasters to Christendom.

Woe woe to England! I have seen a vision
That seven sleepers in the cave of Ephesus
Have turned from right to left.

Seven Wise Masters Lucien the son of Dolopathus was placed under the charge of Virgil, and was tempted in manhood by his step-mother. He repelled her advances, and she accused him to the king of taking liberties with her. By consulting the stars, it was discovered that if he could tide over seven days his life would be spared, so seven wise masters undertook to tell the king a tale each, in illustration of rash judgments. When they had all told their tales, the prince related, under the disguise of a tale, the story of the queen's wantonness, whereupon Lucien was restored to favour, and the queen was put to death—Sandabar, Parables (contemporary with king Couron).

* * John Rolland of Dalkeith has rendered this legend into Scotch verse. There is an Arabic version by Nasr Allah (twelfth century), borrowed from the Indian by Sandabar. In the Hebrew version by Rabbi Joel (1270), the legend is called Kahlah and Dimnah.

Seven Wise Men (The)

One of Plutarch's brochures in the Moralia is entitled, "The Banquet of the Seven Wise Men," in which Perander is made to give an account of a contest at Chalcis between Homer and Hesiod, in which the latter wins the prize, and receives a tripod, on which he caused to be engraved this inscription:

This Hesiod rows to the Heliconian nine
In Chalcis won from Homer the divine.

Sextus [Tarquinius] There are several points of resemblance in the story of Sextus and that of Paris son of Priam: (1) Paris was the guest of Menelaos when he eloped with his wife Helen, and Sextus was the guest of Lucretia when he defiled her. (2) The elopement of Helen was the cause of a national war between the Greek cities and the allied cities of Troy, and the defilement of Lucretia was the cause of a national war between Rome and the allied cities under Porcena. (3) The contest between Greece and Troy terminated in the victory of Greece, the injured party, and the contest between Rome and the supporters of Tarquin terminated in favour of Rome, the injured party. (4) In the Trojan war, Paris, the aggressor, showed himself before the Trojan ranks, and defied the bravest of the Greeks to single combat, but when Menelaos appeared, he took to flight, so Sextus rode vauntingly against the Roman host, but when Herminius appeared, fled to the rear like a coward. (5) In the Trojan contest, Priam and his sons fell in battle, and in the battle of the Lake Regillus, Tarquin and his sons were slain.

Lord Macaulay has taken the "Battle of the Lake Regillus" as the subject of one of his Lays of Ancient Rome. Another of his lays, called "Horatius," is the attempt of Porcena to re-establish Tarquin on the throne.

Seyd, pacha of the Morea, assassinated by Gulnare (2 syl) his favourite concubine. Gulnare was rescued from the burning harem by Conrad "the corsair." Conrad, in the disguise of a dervise, was detected and seized in the palace of Seyd, and Gulnare, to effect his liberation, murdered the pacha—Byron, The Corsair (1814).

Seyton (Lord), a supporter of queen Mary's cause.

Catherine Seyton, daughter of lord Seyton, a maid of honour in the court of queen Mary. She appears at Kinross village in disguise.

Henry Seyton, son of lord Seyton—Sir W. Scott, The Abbot (time, Elizabeth).

Sforza, of Lombardy. He with his two brothers (Achilles and Palamedes), were in the squadron of adventurers in the allied Christian army—Innes, Jerusalem Delivered (1675).

* * The word Sforza means "force," and, according to tradition, was derived thus. Giacomuzzo Attendolo, the son of a day labourer, being desirous of going to the wars, consulted his hatchet, resolving to enust if it stuck fast in the tree at which he flung it. He threw it with such force that the whole blade was completely buried in the trunk (fifteenth century).

Sforza (Ludovico), duke of Milan, surnamed "the More," from mora, "a mulberry" (because he had on his arm a birth-stain of a mulberry colour). Ludovico was dotingly fond of his bride Marcella, and his love was amply returned, but during his absence in the camp, he left Francesco lord protector, and Francesco assailed the fidelity of the young duchess. Failing in his villainy, he accused her to the duke of playing the wanton with him, and the duke, in a fit of jealousy, slew her. Sforza was afterwards poisoned by Eugenia (sister of Francesco) whom he had seduced.

Nina Sforza, the duke's daughter—Massinger, The Duke of Milan (1622).

* * This tragedy is obviously an imitation of Shakespeare's Othello (1611).

Sganarelle, the "cocu imaginaire," a comedy by Molière (1660). The plot runs thus. Célie was betrothed to Léliu, but her father, Gorgibus, insisted on her marrying Valère, because he was the richer man. Célie fainted on hearing this, and dropped her lover's miniature, which was picked up by Sganarelle's wife. Sganarelle, thinking it to be the portrait of a gallant, took possession of it, and Léliu asked him how he came by it. Sganarelle said he took it from his wife, and Léliu supposed that Célie had become the wife of Sganarelle. A series of misapprehensions arose thence. Célie supposed that Léliu had deserted her for Madame Sganarelle, Sganarelle supposed that his wife was unfaithful to him, Madame supposed that her husband was an adorer of Célie, and Léliu supposed that Célie was the wife of Sganarelle. In time they met together, when Léliu charged Célie with being married to Sganarelle, both stared, an explanation followed, a messenger arrived to say that Valère was married, and all went merry as a marriage peal.

Sganarelle, younger brother of Aristo (2 syl), a surly, domineering brute, wise in his own conceit, and the dupe of the play. His brother says to him, "tous vos procédés inspire un air bizarre, et, jusques à l'habit, rend tout chez vous barbare." The father of Isabelle and Léonor, on his death-bed, committed them to the charge of Sganarelle and Ariste, who were either to marry them or dispose of them in marriage. Sganarelle chose Isabelle, but insisted on her dressing in serge, going to bed early, keeping at home, looking after the house, mending the linen, knitting socks, and never flirting with any one. The consequence was, she duped her guardian, and coaxed him into giving his signature to her marriage with Valère.

Malheureux qui se fie à femme après cela !
La meilleure est toujours en malice seconde
C'est un sexe engendré pour damner tout le monde
Je renonce à jamais à ce sexe trompeur
Et je le donne tout au diable de bon cœur
Molière L'école des Maris (1661)

Sganarelle (3 syl.) At about 63 years of age, Sganarelle wished to marry Dorimène (3 syl.) daughter of Alcantor, a girl fond of dances, parties of pleasure, and all the active enjoyments of young life. Feeling some doubts about the wisdom of this step, he first consults a friend, who dissuades him, but, seeing the advice is rejected, replies, "Do as you like." He next consults two philosophers, but they are so absorbed in their philosophy that they pay no attention to him. He then asks the gypsies, who take his money and decamp with a dance. At length, he overhears Dorimène telling a young lover that she only marries the old dotard for his money, and that he cannot live above a few months, so he makes up his mind to decline the marriage. The father of the lady places the matter in his son's hands, and the young fire-eater, armed with two swords, goes at once to the old fiancé, and begs him to choose one. When Sganarelle declines to fight, the young man beats him soundly, and again bids him choose a sword. After two or three good beatings, Sganarelle consents to the marriage "forcé"—Molière, Le Mariage Forcé (1664).

(There is a supplement to this comedy by the same author, entitled Sganarelle ou Le Cocu Imaginaire.)

 This joke about marrying is borrowed from Rabelais, Pantagruel, iii 35, etc. Panurge asks Trouillogan whether he would advise him to marry. The sage says, "No." "But I wish to do so," says the prince. "Then do so, by all means," says the sage. "Which, then, would you advise?" asks Panurge. "Neither," says Trouillogan. "But," says Panurge, "that is not possible." "Then both," says the sage. After this, Panurge consults many others on the subject, and lastly the oracle of the Holy Bottle.

The plot of Molière's comedy is founded on an adventure recorded of the count of Grammont (qv). The count had promised marriage to la belle Hamilton, but deserted her, and tried to get to France. Being overtaken by the two brothers of the lady, they clapped their hands on their swords, and demanded if the count had not forgotten something or left something behind. "True," said the count. "I have forgotten to marry your sister," and returned with the two brothers to repair this oversight.

Sganarelle, father of Lucinde. Anxious about his daughter because she has lost her vivacity and appetite, he sends for four physicians, who retire to consult upon the case, but talk only on indifferent topics. When Sganarelle asks the result of their deliberation, they all differ, both in regard to the disease and the remedy to be applied. Lusette (the lady's maid) sends for Clitandre, the lover, who comes disguised as a quack doctor, tells Sganarelle that the young lady's disease must be acted on through the imagination, and prescribes a mock marriage. Sganarelle consents to the experiment, but Clitandre's assistant being a notary, the mock marriage proves to be a real one—Molière, L'Amour Médecin (1665).

Sganarelle, husband of Martine. He is a faggot-maker, and has a quarrel with his wife, who vows to be even with him for striking her. Valère and Lucas (two domestics of Géronte) ask her to direct them to the house of a noted doctor. She sends them to her husband, and tells them he is so eccentric that he will deny being a doctor, but they must heat him well. So they find the faggot-maker, whom they beat soundly, till he consents to follow them. He is introduced to Lucinde, who pretends to be dumb, but, being a shrewd man, he soon finds out that the dumbness is only a pretence, and takes with him Léandre as an apothecary. The two lovers understand each other, and Lucinde is rapidly cured with "pills matrimoniacs"—Molière, Le Médecin Malgré Lui (1666).

 Sganarelle, being asked by the father what he thinks is the matter with Lucinde, replies, "Entendez-vous le Latin?" "En aucune façon," says Géronte. "Vous n'entendez point le Latin?" "Non, monsieur." "That is a sad pity," sganarelle, "for the case may be briefly stated thus

Shakespeare's Home He left London before 1613, and established himself at Stratford-on-Avon, in Warwickshire, where he was born (1561), and where he died (1616) In the diary of Mr Ward, the vicar of Stratford, is this entry "Shakspeare, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merry meeting, and, it seems, drank too hard, for Shakspeare died of a fever then contracted" (Drayton died 1631, and Ben Jonson, 1637) Probably Shakespeare died on his birthday, April 23

Shakespeare's Parents His father was John Shakespeare, a glover, who married Mary Arden, daughter of Robert Arden, Esq, of Bomch, a good county gentleman

Shakespeare's Wife, Anne Hathaway of Shottery, some eight years older than himself, daughter of a substantial yeoman Shakespeare's Children One son, Hamnet, who died in his twelfth year (1585-1596) Two daughters, who survived him, Susanna, and Judith twin-born with Hamnet. Both his daughters married and had children, but the lines died out.

It is a cry of Shakespeare "Rimmer had very good reason to say that Shakespeare is a great glib man" Voltare, in 1761, said, "Shakespeare is a man with some imagination, whose plays can please only in London and Canada." In 1765 he wrote to M. de Cideville, "Shakespeare is the Corneille of London, but everywhere else he is a great fool (grand je d'ailleurs)"

Shakespeare of Divines (The), Jeremy Taylor (1613-1667)

It is (Taylor) divine and wise and what they can be full to feel, the name and the matter arranged to make it in poetry — Heber

Shakespeare of Eloquence (The) The comte de Mirabeau was so called by Barnave (1749-1791)

Shakespeare of Germany (The), Augustus Frederick Ferdinand von Kotzebue (1761-1819) Also G. K. W. Grossman

Shakespeare of Prose Fiction (The) Richardson the novelist is so called by D'Israeli (1689-1761)

Shallow, a weak-minded country justice, cousin to Slender. He is a great braggart, and especially fond of boasting of the mad pranks of his younger days. It is said that justice Shallow is a satirical portrait of sir Thomas Lucy of Charlroote, who prosecuted Shakespeare for deer-stealing — Shakespeare, The Merry Wives of Windsor (1596), and Henry IV (1598)

It was as a justice of the quorum and ex officio in 1598 — 1599

Shallum, lord of a manor consisting of a long chain of rocks and mountains called Tirab. Shallum was "of gentle disposition, and beloved both by God and man." He was the lover of Hilpa, a Chinese antediluvian princess, one of the 160 daughters of Zilpah, of the race of Colu or Can — Addison, Spectator, viii 581-5 (1712)

Shalott (The lady of), a poem by Tennyson, in four parts. Pt. i tells us that the lady passed her life in the island of Shalott in great seclusion, and was known only by the peasantry. Pt. ii tells us that she was weaving a magic web, and that a curse would fall on her if she looked down the river. Pt. iii describes how sir Lancelot rode to Camel-lot in all his bravery, and the lady gazed at him as he rode along. Pt. iv tells us that the lady floated down the river in a boat called The Lady of Shalott, and died heart-broken on the way. Sir Lancelot came to gaze on the dead body, and exclaimed, "She has a lovely face, and may God have mercy on her!" This ballad was afterwards expanded into the Idyll called "Llaine, the Fair Maid of Astolat" (q.v.), the beautiful incident of Llaine and the barge being taken from the History of Prince Arthur, by sir T. Malory.

While my body is so low I let this letter be put into my right hand and my hand be put into the letter and I let it be put into a fair bed with all the richest clothes that I have about me and so let my hand and all my rich clothes be laid with me in a closet to the next place where the Thun is and there let me be put in a large and but one man with me such as ye but to see me thither and that my hand be covered with lace, mantle over and over. So when she was dead the corpse and the bed and all was laid the next way unto the Thun, and there a man and the corpse and all were put in a large on the Thun, and so the man carried the large to Westmister and there he laid a great wife to and for or any an (1598-1599) L. H. L.

King Arthur saw the body and had it buried, and sir Lancelot made an offering, etc. (ch. 121), much the same as Levenson has reproduced it in verse.

Shamho'zai (ש'ח'ז'י), the angel who debauched himself with women, repented, and hung himself up between earth and heaven — Bereshit rabbi (in Gen. vi. 2)

* Harut and Marut were two angels sent to be judges on earth. They judged righteously till Zohara appeared before them, when they fell in love with her, and were imprisoned in a cave near Babylon, where they are to abide till the day of judgment.

Shandy (Tristram), the nominal hero of Sterne's novel called The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy, Gentleman (1759). He is the son of Walter and Elizabeth Shandy.

Captain Shandy, better known as "Uncle Toby," the real hero of Sterne's novel. Captain Shandy was wounded at Namur, and retired on half-pay. He was benevolent and generous, brave as a lion but simple as a child, most gallant and most modest. Hazlitt says that "the character of uncle Toby is the finest compliment ever paid to human nature." His modest love-passages with Widow Wadman, his kindly sympathy for lieutenant Lefevre, and his military discussions, are wholly unrivalled.

Aunt Dinah [Shandy], Walter Shandy's

aunt Sho bequeathed to him £1000, which Walter fancied would enable him to carry out all the wild schemes with which his head was crammed

Mrs Elizabeth Shandy, mother of Tristram Shandy The ideal of nonentity, individual from its very absence of individuality

Walter Shandy, Tristram's father, a metaphysical don Quixote, who believes in long noses and propitious names, but his son's nose was crushed, and his name, which should have been Trismegistus ("the most propitious"), was changed in christening to Tristram ("the most unlucky") If much learning can make man mad, Walter Shandy was certainly mad in all the affairs of ordinary life His wife was a blank sheet, and he himself a sheet so written on and crossed and rewritten that no one could decipher the manuscript — L. Sterne, The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (1759)

Sharp, the ordinary of major Touchwood, who aids him in his transformation, but is himself puzzled to know which is the real and which the false colonel — T. Dibdin, What Next?

Sharp (Rebecca), the orphan daughter of an artist "She was small and slight in person, pale, sandy-haired, and with green eyes, habitually cast down, but very large, odd, and attractive when they looked up" Becky had the "dismal precocity of poverty," and, being engaged as governess in the family of sir Pitt Crawley, hart, contrived to marry clandestinely his son captain Rawdon Crawley, and taught him how to live in splendour "upon nothing a year" Becky was an excellent singer and dancer, a capital talker and wheedler, and a most attractive, but unprincipled, selfish, and unscrupulous woman Lord Steyne introduced her to court, but her conduct with this peer gave rise to a terrible scandal, which caused a separation between her and Rawdon, and made England too hot to hold her She retired to the Continent, was reduced to a Bohemian life, but ultimately attached herself to Joseph Sedley, whom she contrived to strip of all his money, and who lived in dire terror of her, dying in six months under very suspicious circumstances — Thackeray, Vanity Fair (1848)

With Becky Sharp we think we could be good if we had £1,000 a year — Bayne

Becky Sharp with a baronet for a brother in law and an earl's daughter for a friend felt the hollowness of human grandeur and thought she was happier with the Bohemian artists in Soho — The Express

Sharp (Timothy), the "lying valet" of Charles Gayless His object is to make his master, who has not a sixpence in the world, pass for a man of wealth in the eyes of Melissa, to whom he is engaged — Garrick, The Lying Valet (1741)

Sharp-Beak, the crow's wife, in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox (1498)

Sharpe (The Right Rev James), archbishop of St Andrew's, murdered by John Balfour (a leader in the covenanter's army) and his party — Sir W Scott, Old Mortality (time, Charles II)

Sharper (Master), the cutler in the Strand — Sir W Scott, Peveril of the Peak (time, Charles II)

Sharpitlaw (Gideon), a police officer — Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Shawonda'ssee, son of Mudjckewis, and king of the south wind Fat and lazy, listless and easy Shawondasee loved a prairie maiden (the Dandelion), but was too indolent to woo her — Longfellow, Hiawatha (1855)

The Stoops to Conquer, a comedy by Oliver Goldsmith (1773) Miss Hardcastle, knowing how bashful young Marlow is before ladies, stoops to the manners and condition of a barmaid, with whom he feels quite at his ease, and by this artifice wins the man of her choice

* * It is said that when Goldsmith was about 16 years old, he set out for Edgworthstown, and finding night coming on when at Ardagh, asked a man "which was the best house in the town" — meaning the best inn The man, who was Cornelius O'Kelly, the great fencing-master, pointed to that of Mr Ralph Fetherstone, as being the best house in the vicinity Oliver entered the parlour, found the master of the mansion sitting over a good fire, and said he intended to pass the night there, and should like to have supper Mr Fetherstone happened to know Goldsmith's father, and, to humour the joke, pretended to be the landlord of "the public," nor did he reveal himself till next morning at breakfast, when Oliver called for his bill It was not sir Ralph Fetherstone, as is generally said, but Mr. Ralph Fetherstone, whose grandson was sir Thomas

Sheba The queen of Sheba or Saba (i.e. the Sabaeans) came to visit Solomon, and tested his wisdom by sundry questions, but affirmed that his wisdom and wealth exceeded even her expectations — 1 Kings x, 2 Chron ix

Tennyson The Princess II.

* * The Arabs call her name Balkis or Belkis, the Abyssinians, Macqueda, and others, Anzis

Sheba (The queen of), a name given to Mde Montroville (the Begum Mootee Mahul) — Sir W Scott, The Surgeon's Daughter (time, George II)

Shebdiz, the Persian Bucephalos, the favourite charger of Chosroës II or Khosrou Parviz of Persia (590-628)

Shedad, king of Ad, who built a most magnificent palace, and laid out a garden called "The Garden of Irem," like "the bowers of Eden" All men admired this palace and garden except the prophet Houd, who told the king that the foundation of his palace was not secure And so it was, that God, to punish his pride, first sent a drought of three years' duration, and then the Sarsar or icy wind for seven days, in which the garden was destroyed, the palace ruined, and Shedad, with all his subjects, died

It is said that the palace of Shedad or Shuddaad took 500 years in building, and when it was finished the angel of death would not allow him even to enter his garden, but struck him dead, and the rose garden of Irem was ever after invisible to the eye of man — Southey, Thalaba the Destroyer, 1 (1797)

Sheep (Lord Bantam's) These sheep had tails of such enormous length that his lordship had go-carts harnessed to the sheep for carrying their tails

There goes Mrs. Roundabout the cutler's wife.
Odious puss! how she puddles along with her train two yards behind her! She puts me in mind of lord Bantam's sheep — Goldsmith The Bee II. (1759)

Sheep (The Cotswold)

No brown nor sullied black the face or legs doth streak

[All] of the whitest kind whose brows so woolly be

As men in her fair sheep no more see

A body long and large

And of the fleecy face

But everywhere is store

Drayton Polyolbion xiv (1613)

Sheep-Dog (A), a lady-companion, who occupies the back seat of the br-ronche, carries wraps, etc, goes to church with the lady, and "guards her from the wolves," as much as the lady wishes to be guarded, but no more

'Rawdon' said Becky 'I must have a sheep dog I mean a moral shepherd's dog to keep the wolves off me' A sheep-dog n companion!
Becky Sharp with a sheep-dog! Isn't that good fun! —
Thackeray Vanity Fair xxxvii. (1848)

Sheep of the Addane Valley
In this valley, which led to the cave of the Addane, were two flocks of sheep, one white and the other black When any one of the black sheep bleated, a white sheep crossed over and became black, and when one of the white sheep bleated, a black sheep crossed over and became white — The Mahabogion ("Peredur," twelfth century)

Sheep of the Prisons, a cant term in the French Revolution for a spy under the jailers — C Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities, III 7 (1859)

Sheep Tilted at Don Quixote saw the dust of two flocks of sheep coming in opposite directions, and told Sancho they were two armies—one commanded by the emperor Alifanfaron sovereign of the island of Trpoban, and the other by the king of the Garman'teans, called "Pentapolin with the Naked Arm" He said that Alifanfaron was in love with Pentapolin's daughter, but Pentapolin refused to sanction the alliance, because Alifanfaron was a Mohammedan The mad knight rushed on the flock "led by Alifanfaron," and killed seven of the sheep, but was stunned by stones thrown at him by the shepherds When Sancho told his master that the two armies were only two flocks of sheep, the knight replied that the enchanter Freston had "metamorphosed the two grand armies" in order to show his malice — Cervantes, Don Quixote, I III 4 (1605)

* * After the death of Achillès, Ajax and Ulysses both claimed the armour of Hector The dispute was settled by the sons of Atreus (2 syl), who awarded the prize to Ulysses This so enraged Ajax that it drove him mad, and he fell upon a flock of sheep driven at night into the camp, supposing it to be an army led by Ulysses and the sons of Atreus When he found out his mistake, he stabbed himself This is the subject of a tragedy by Sophocles called Ajax Mad

* * Orlando in his madness also fell foul of a flock of sheep — Ariosto, Orlando Furioso (1516)

Sheffield (The Bard of), James Montgomery, author of The Wanderer of Switzerland, etc (1771-1854)

With broken lyre and cheek serenely pale
Lo! sad Alcmaeus wanders down the vale
O'er his lost works let classic Sheffield weep
May no rude hand disturb their early sleep!
Byron English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1800)

Shelby (Mr), uncle Tom's first master Being in commercial difficulties, he was obliged to sell his faithful slave His son afterwards endeavoured to buy uncle Tom back again, but found that he had been whipped to death by the villain Legree—Mrs Beecher Stowe, Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852)

Shell (A) Amongst the ancient Gaels a shell was emblematic of peace Hence when Bosmina, Fingal's daughter, was sent to propitiate king Erragon, who had invaded Morven, she carried with her a "sparkling shell as a symbol of peace, and a golden arrow as a symbol of war"—Ossian, The Battle of Lora

Shells, i.e. hospitality "Semo king of shells" ("hospitality") When Cuthullin invites Swaran to a banquet, his messenger says, "Cuthullin gives the joy of shells, come and partake the feast of Erin's blue eyed chief" The ancient Gaels drank from shells, and hence such phrases as "chief of shells," "hall of shells," "king of shells," etc (king of hospitality) "To rejoice in the shell" is to feast sumptuously and drink freely

Shemus-an-Snachad or "James of the Needle," Mr. or's tailor at Edinburgh—Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Shepherd's Calendar (The), twelve eclogues in various metres, by Spenser, one for each month January Colin Clout (Spenser) bewails that Rosalind does not return his love, and compares his forlorn condition to the season itself February Cuddy, a lad, complains of the cold, and Thenot laments the degeneracy of pastoral life March Willie and Thomalin discourse of love (described as a person just aroused from sleep) April Hobbinol sings a song on Eliza, queen of shepherds May Palinode (3 syl) exhorts Piers to join the festivities of May, but Piers replies that good shepherds who seek their own indulgence expose their flocks to the wolves He then relates the fable of the kid and her dam June Hobbinol exhorts Colin to greater cheerfulness, but Colin replies there is no cheer for him while Rosalind remains unkid and loves Menalcas better than himself July Morrel, a goat herd, invites Thomalin to come with him to the uplands, but Thomalin replies that humility better becomes a shepherd (i.e. a pastor or clergyman) August Perigot and Willie contend in song, and Cuddy is appointed arbiter September Diggon Davie complains to Hobbinol of clerical abuses October On poetry, which Cuddy says has no encouragement, and laments that Colin neglects it, being crossed in love November Colin, being asked by Thenot to sing, excuses himself because of his grief for Dido, but finally he sings her elegy December Colin again complains that his heart is desolate because Rosalind loves him not (1579)

Shepherds Hunting (The), four "eclogues" by George Wither, while confined in the Marshalsea (1615) The shepherd Rogot is the poet himself, and his "hunting" is a satire called Abuses Stript and Whipt, for which he was imprisoned The first three eclogues are upon the subject of Rogot's imprisonment, and the fourth is on his love of poetry "Willi" is the poet's friend, William Browne of the Inner Temple, author of Britannia's Pastorals He was two years the junior of Wither

Shepherd (The), Moses, who for forty years fed the flocks of Jethro, his father-in-law

Sing heavenly Mure that on the secret top
Of Oreb or of Sinai didst inspire
* That shepherd who first taught the chosen seed
In the beginning how the heaven and earth
Rose out of chaos.

Milton Paradise Lost I. (166-7)

Shepherd (The Gentle), George Grenville, the statesman One day, in addressing the House, George Grenville said, "I tell me where! tell me where" Pitt hummed the line of a song then very popular, beginning, "Gentle shepherd, tell me where!" and the whole House was convulsed with laughter (1712-1770)

* * Allan Ramsay has a beautiful Scotch pastoral called The Gentle Shepherd (1725)

Shepherd (John Claridge), the signature adopted by the author of The Shepherd of Banbury's Rules to Judge of the Changes of Weather, etc (1744) Supposed to be Dr John Campbell, author of A Political Survey of Britain

Shepherd-Kings (The) or Hyksos These hyksos were a tribe of Cuthites driven from Assyria by Araluis and the Shemites Their names were (1) Sauris or Salatis, called by the Arabs El-Weleed, and said to be a descendant of Esau

(B.C. 1870-1851), (2) ELON, called by the Arabs Er-Reiyan, son of El-Weleed (B.C. 1851-1811), (3) APACHNAS (B.C. 1811-1750), (4) ARÖPHIS, called by the Arabs Er-Reiyan II, in whose reign Joseph was sold into Egypt and was made viceroy (B.C. 1750-1700), (5) JAMIAS (B.C. 1700-1651), (6) ASSETH (1651-1610). The Hyksos were driven out of Egypt by Amösis or Thethmosis, the founder of the eighteenth dynasty, and retired to Palestine, where they formed the chiefs or lords of the Philistines (Hyksos is compounded of *hy*l, "king," and sos, "shepherd")

* * Apophis or Aphophis was not a shepherd-king, but a pharaoh or native ruler, who made Apachnas tributary, and succeeded him, but on the death of Aphophis the hyksos were restored

Shepherd Lord (The), lord Henry de Cliford, brought up by his mother as a shepherd to save him from the vengeance of the Yorkists. Henry VII restored him to his birthright and estates (1455-1548)

The gracious fairy
Who loved the shepherd lord to meet
In his wanderings solitary
Wordsworth The White Doe of Rylstone (1815)

Shepherd of Banbury (See SHEPHERD, JOHN CLARIDGE)

Shepherd of Filida.

' Preserve him, Mr Nicholas, as thou wouldst a diamond. He is not a shepherd but an elegant courtier,' said the curé—Cervantes Don Quixote I. I. 8 (160.)

Shepherd of Salisbury Plain (The), the hero and title of a religious tract by Hannah More. The shepherd is noted for his homely wisdom and simple piety. The academy figure of this shepherd was David Saunders, who, with his father, had kept sheep on the plain for a century.

Shepherd of the Ocean. So Colin Clout (Spenser) calls sir Walter Raleigh in his Colin Clout's Come Home Again (1591)

Shepherdess (The Faithful), a pastoral drama by John Fletcher (1610). The "faithful shepherdess" is Corin, who remains faithful to her lover although dead. Milton has borrowed rather largely from this pastoral in his Comus.

Sheppard (Jack), immortalized for his burglaries and escapes from Newgate. He was the son of a carpenter in Spitalfields, and was an ardent, reckless, and generous youth. Certainly the most popular criminal ever led to Tyburn for execution (1701-1724)

* * Daniel Defoe made Jack Sheppard the hero of a romance in 1724, and W. H. Ainsworth in 1839.

Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, always brings ill luck to the possessor. It belonged at one time to the see of Canterbury, and Osmund pronounced a curse on any layman who wrested it from the Church.

The first layman who held these lands was the protector Somerset, who was beheaded by Edward VI.

The next layman was sir Walter Raleigh, who was also beheaded.

At the death of Raleigh, James I seized on the lands and conferred them on Car earl of Somerset, who died prematurely. His younger son Carew was attainted, committed to the Tower, and lost his estates by forfeiture.

* * James I was no exception. He lost his eldest son the prince of Wales, Charles I was beheaded, James II was forced to abdicate, and the two Pretenders consummated the ill luck of the family.

Sherborne is now in the possession of Digby earl of Bristol.

(For other possessions which carry with them ill luck, see GOLD OF TOLOSA, GOLD OF NIBELUNGEN, GRISTEEI, HARMONIA'S NECKLACE, etc.)

Sheva, the philanthropic Jew, most modest but most benevolent. He "stints his appetite to pamper his affections, and lives in poverty that the poor may live in plenty." Sheva is "the widows' friend, the orphans' father, the poor man's protector, and the universal dispenser of charity, but he ever shrank to let his left hand know what his right hand did." Ratcliffe's father rescued him at Cadiz from an auto da fe, and Ratcliffe himself rescued him from a howling London mob. This noble heart settled £10,000 on Miss Ratcliffe at her marriage, and left Charles the heir of all his property—Cumberland, The Jew (1776).

* * The Jews of England made up a very handsome purse, which they presented to the dramatist for this championship of their race.

Sheva, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is designed for sir Roger Lestranger, censor of the press in the reign of Charles II. Sheva was one of David's scribes (2 Sam. xx 25), and sir Roger was editor of the Observer, in which he vindicated the court measures, for which he was knighted

Than Shera, none more loyal zeal have shown,
Wakeful as Judah a lion for the crown
Tate Abraham and Achitophel II. (1639)

Shibboleth, the test pass-word of a secret society. When the Ephraimites tried to pass the Jordan after their defeat by Jephthah, the guard tested whether they were Ephraimites or not by asking them to say the word "Shibboleth," which the Ephraimites pronounced "Sibboleth" (Judges II. 1-6)

In the Sicilian Vespers, a word was given as a test of nationality. Some dried peas (ciceri) were shown to a suspect if he called them cheecharec, he was a Sicilian, and allowed to pass, but if sicari, he was a Frenchman, and was put to death.

In the great Danish slaughter on St. Brice's Day (November 13), 1002, according to tradition, a similar test was made with the words "Chechester Church," which, being pronounced hard or soft, decided whether the speaker were Dane or Saxon.

Shield. When a hero fell in fight, his shields left at home used to become blood. —Gaelic Legendary Lore

The mother of Cúchulain remains in the hall
His shield is bloody in the hall Art thou fallen my fair halberd son In Erin's dismal war? —Ossian Temora v

Shield (Point of a). When a flag emblazoned with a shield had the point upwards, it denoted peace, and when a combatant approached with his shield reversed, it meant the same thing in mediæval times.

And behold, one of the ships outstripped the others, and they saw a shield lifted up above the side of the ship and the point of the shield was upwards, in token of peace —
The Lubinogion (Branwen " etc. twelfth century)

Shield (Striking the). When a leader was appointed to take the command of an army, and the choice was doubtful, those who were the most eligible went to some distant hill, and he who struck his shield the loudest was chosen leader.

They went each to his hill. Bards marked the sounds of the shields. Loudest rang thy boss Duth maruno Thou must lead in war —Ossian Cath Loda II.

 When a man was doomed to death, the chief used to strike his shield with the blunt end of his spear, as a notice to the royal bard to begin the death-song.

Calbar rises in his arms. The clang of shields is heard. —Ossian Temora I Shield of Cathmor (The). This shield had seven bosses, and the ring of each boss (when struck with a spear) conveyed a distinct telegraphic message to the tribes. The sound of one boss, for example, was for muster, of another for retreat, of a third distress, and so on. On each boss was a star, the names of which were Can'-mation (on the first boss), Col-derna (on the second), Ulochio (on the third), Cathlin (on the fourth), Rel-durath (on the fifth), Berthin (on the sixth), and Ton-the'na (on the seventh).

In his arms strode the chief of Atha to where his shield hung high at night high on a mossy bough over Lutar's streamy roar. Seven bosses rose on the shield the seven voices of the king which his warriors received from the wind —Ossian Temora VII.

Shield of Gold or Golden Shield, the shield of Mars, which fell from heaven, and was guarded in Rome by twelve priests called Salii.

Charge for the hearth of Vesta
Charge for the Golden Shield I

Stan. a. xxxv

Hail to the fire that burns for aye [of Vesta]
And the shield that fell from heaven I
Macaulay Lays of Ancient Rome (Battle of the Lake Regillus xxxviii. 1849)

Shield of Love (The). This buckler was suspended in a temple of Venus by golden ribbons, and underneath was written "WHosoever BE THIS SHIELD, FAIR AMORFT BE HIS" —Spenser, Faery Queen, IV. 10 (1596)

Shield of Rome (The), Fabius "Cunctator" Marcellus was called "The Sword of Rome" (See FABRUS)

Shift (Samuel), a wonderful mimic, who, like Charles Mathews the elder, could turn his face to anything. He is employed by sir William Wealthy to assist in saving his son George from ruin, and accordingly helps the young man in his money difficulties by becoming his agent. Ultimately, it is found that sir George's father is his creditor, the young man is saved from ruin, marries, and becomes a reformed and honourable member of society, who has "sown his wild oats" —Foote, The Minor (1760)

Shilla'lah, a wood near Arklow, in Wicklow, famous for its oaks and blackthorns. The Irishman's blindgeon is so called, because it was generally cut from this wood.

Shilling (To cut one off with a). A tale is told of Charles and John Banister. John having irritated his father, the old man said, "Jack, I'll cut you off with a shilling." To which the son replied, "I wish, dad, you would give it me now."

 The same identical anecdote is told of Sheridan and his son Tom.

Ship The master takes the ship out, but the mate brings her home The reason is this On the first night of an outward passage, the starboard watch takes the first four hours on deck, but in the homeward passage the port watch Now, the "starboard watch" is also called the master's or captain's watch, because when there was only one mate, the master had to take his own watch (i.e. the starboard) The "port watch" is commanded by the first mate, and when there was only one, he had to stand to his own watch

* * When there are two mates, the second mate takes the starboard watch

Ship (The Intelligent) Ellida (Frithjof's ship) understood what was said to it, hence in the Frithjof Saga the son of Thorsten constantly addresses it, and the ship always obeys what is said to it — Tegnér, Frithjof Saga, v (1825)

Ship-Shape A vessel sent to sea before it is completed is called "jury-shipped" or "jury-rigged," i.e. rigged for the nonce (your-y, "pro temporê"), while at sea, she is completed, and when all the temporary makeshifts have been changed for the proper riggings, the vessel is called "ship-shape"

Having been sent to sea in a hurry they were little better than jury rigged and we are now being put into ship-shape — Daily News August 23 1870

Shipton (Mother), the heroine of an ancient tale entitled The Strange and Wonderful History and Prophecies of Mother Shipton, etc — T. Evan Preece

Shipwreck (The), a poem in three cantos, by William Falconer (1762) Supposed to occupy six days The ship was the Britannia, under the command of Albert, and bound for Venice Being overtaken in a squall, she is driven out of her course from Candia, and four seamen are lost off the Ice main-yardarm A fearful storm greatly distresses the vessel, and the captain gives command "to bear away" As she passes the island of St. George, the helmsman is struck blind by lightning Bowsprit, foremast, and main-topmast being carried away, the officers try to save themselves on the wreck of the foremast The ship splits on the projecting verge of cape Colonna

The captain and all his crew are lost except Arion (Falconer), who is washed ashore, and being befriended by the natives, returns to England to tell this mournful story

Shoe The right shoe first It was by the Romans thought unlucky to put on the left shoe first, or to put the shoe on the wrong foot St. Foix says of Augustus

Cet empereur qui gouverna avec tant de sagesse et dont le regne fut si florissant, restoit immobile et consterné lorsqu'il lui arrivoit par mégarde de mettre le soulier droit au pied gauche et le soulier gauche au pied droit.

Shoe Pinches We all know where the shoe pinches, we each of us know our own special troubles

Lord Foppington. Hark thee shoemaker, these shoes don't fit me.

Shoemaker. My lord, I think they fit you very well.

Lord Fop. They hurt me just be ow the instep

Shoem. No my lord they don't hurt you there

Lord Fop. I tell thee they pinch me execrably

Shoem. Why then my lord—

Lord Fop. Whail! Wilt thou persuade me I cannot feel?

Shoem. Your lordship may please to feel what you think fit but that shoe does not hurt you. I think I understand my trade. — Sheridan, A Trip to Scarborough l. 2 (1777)

Shoe in Weddings In English weddings, slippers and old shoes are thrown at the bride when she leaves the house of her parents, to indicate that she has left the house for good

Luther being at a wedding told the bridegroom he had placed the husband's shoe on the head of the bed afin qu'il prit ainsi la domination et le gouvernement. — Mischelet, Life of Luther (1843)

In Turkish weddings, as soon as the prayers are over, the bridegroom makes off as fast as possible, followed by the guests, who pelt him with old shoes These blows represent the adieux of the young man — Thirty Years in the Harari, 330

In Anglo-Saxon marriages, the father delivered the bride's shoe to the bridegroom, and the bridegroom touched the bride on the head with it, to show his authority — Chambers, Journal, June, 1870

Shoe the Gray Goose, to undertake a difficult and profitless business John Skelton says the attempt of the laity to reform the clergy of his time is about as mad a scheme as if they attempted to shoe wild geese

What hath laymen to doe The gray go a to shoe?
J. Skelton, Colyn Cloute (1499-1529)

* * "To shoe the goose" is sometimes used as the synonym of being tipsy Shoe the Mockish Mare, shoe the wild mare, similar to "belting the eat," to do a work of danger and difficulty for general not personal benefit

Let us see who dare shoe the mock-h mare.
J Skelton Colyn Olout (1490-1529)

* * * There is a boys' game called "Shoeing the Wild Mare," in which the players say

Shoe the wild mare
But if she won't be shod she must go bare.

Herrick refers to it (Works, i 176) when he says

Of blind man's buffe and of the care
That young men have to shoe the mare

"To shoe the colt" means to exact a fine called "footing" from a new associate or colt. The French say, Pirrer la mule

Shoes (He has changed his), "mutā it calceos," that is, he has become a senator, or has been made a peer. The Roman senators wore black shoes, or rather black huskins, reaching to the middle of the leg, with the letter C in silver on the instep

(For several other customs and superstitions connected with shoes, see Dictionary of Phrase and Fable, 815-6)

Shonou (The Reign of), the most remote period, historic or pre-historical

Let us first learn to know what belongs to ourselves and then if we have leisure cast our reflections back to the reign of Shonou who governed 20 000 years before the creation of the moon—Goldsmith A Citizen of the World lxxx (1759)

Shoolbred (Dame), the foster-mother of Henry Smith—Sir W. Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Shore (Jane), the heroine and title of a tragedy by N. Rowe (1713). Jane Shore was the wife of a London merchant, but left her husband to become the mistress of Edward IV. At the death of that monarch, lord Hastings wished to obtain her, but she rejected his advances. This drew on her the jealous wrath of Alicia (lord Hastings's mistress), who induced her to accuse lord Hastings of want of allegiance to the lord protector. The duke of Gloucester commanded the instant execution of Hastings, and, accusing Jane Shore of having bewitched him, condemned her to wander about in a sheet, holding a taper in her hand, and decreed that any one who offered her food or shelter should be put to death. Jane continued an outcast for three days, when her husband came to her succour, but he was seized by Gloucester's myrmidons, and Jane Shore died

James Smithson (1809) had a splendid voice, a tall and noble person. Her Jane Shore put more money into the manager's pocket than Edmund Kean. Merely Miss Foote or Charles Kemble.—Donaldson 1 collection

Shoreditch. The old London tradition is that Shoreditch derived its name from Jane Shore, the beautiful mistress of Edward IV, who, worn out with poverty and hunger, died miserably in a ditch in this suburb

I could not get one bit of bread Whereby my hunger might be fed
So weary of my life at length
I yielded up my vital strength
Within a ditch which since that day
Is Shoreditch called as writers say
A ballad in Pepys's collection The Woeful Lamentation of Jane Shore

Stow says the name is a corruption of "sewer-ditch," or the common drain. Both these etymologies are only good for fable, as the word is derived from sir John de Soerdich, an eminent statesman and diplomatist, who "rode with Manney and Chandos against the French by the side of the Black Prince"

Shoreditch (Duke of) Barlow, the favourite archer of Henry VIII, was so entitled by the Merry Monarch, in royal sport. Barlow's two skilful companions were created at the same time, "marguis of Islington," and "earl of Paneras"

Good King make not good lord of Lincoln duke of Shoreditch.—The Poor Man's Petition to the Kings (art. xvi 1603)

Shropshire Toast (The), "To all friends round the Wrekin"

Shufflebottom (Abel), a name assumed by Robert Southey in some of his amatory productions (1771-1843)

Shuffleton (The Hon Tom), a man of very slender estate, who borrows of all who will lend, but always forgets to repay or return the loans. When spoken to about it, he interrupts the speaker before he comes to the point, and diverts the conversation to some other subject. He is one of the new school, always emotionless, looks on money as the summum bonum, and all as fair that puts money in his purse. The Hon Tom Shuffleton marries lady Caroline Braymore, who has £1000 a year (See DIMANCH) — G Colman, junior, John Bull.

Shutters (Tom, put up the) A lieutenant threatened Mr Hobbs of St James's Street (London), to withdraw his custom, whereupon Mr Hobbs instantly called out to his errand boy, "Tom, put up the shutters" This witty reproof has become a stock phrase of braver with tradesmen when a silly customer threatens to withdraw his custom

Shylock, the Jew, who lends Anthonio (a Venetian merchant) 8000 ducats for three months, on these conditions. If repaid within the time, only the principal would be required, if not, the Jew should be at liberty to cut from Anthonio's body a pound of flesh. The ships of Anthonio being delayed by contrary winds, the merchant was unable to meet his bill, and the Jew claimed the forfeiture. Portia, in the dress of a law doctor, conducted the trial, and when the Jew was about to take his bond, reminded him that he must shed no drop of blood, nor must he cut either more or less than an exact pound. If these conditions were infringed, his life would be forfeit. The Jew, feeling it to be impossible to exact the bond under such conditions, gave up the claim, but was heavily fined for seeking the life of a Venetian citizen — Shakespeare, The Merchant of Venice (1598)

It was of C Macklin (1690-1797) that Pope wrote the dog-gerel

This is the Jew
 That Shakespeare drew;

but Edmund Kean (1787-1833) was unrivalled in this character

According to the kindred authority of Shylock no man hates the thing he would not kill — Sir W. Scott.

* * Paul Seechi tells us a similar tale. A merchant of Venice, having been informed by private letter that Drake had taken and plundered St Domingo, sent word to Sampson Ceneda, a Jewish usurer. Ceneda would not believe it, and bet a pound of flesh it was not true. When the report was confirmed, the pope told Seechi he might lawfully claim his bet if he chose, only he must draw no blood, nor take either more or less than an exact pound, on the penalty of being hanged — Gregorio Leti, Life of Sixtus V (1666)

Sibyls Plato speaks of only one sibyl, Martian Capella says there were two (the Erythraean or Cumaean sibyl, and the Phrygian), Pliny speaks of the three sibyls, Jackson maintains, on the authority of Alian, that there were four, Shakespeare speaks of the nine sibyls of old Rome (1 Henry VI act 1 sc 2), Varro says they were ten (the sibyls of Libya, Samos, Cumæ (in Italy), Cumæ (in Asia Minor), Erythraean, Persia, Tiburtis, Delphi, Aneyra (in Phrygia), and Marpessa), in reference to which Rabelais says, "she may be the eleventh sibyl" (Pantagruel, iii 16), the mediæval monks made the number to be twelve, and gave to each a distinct prophecy respecting Christ. But whatever the number, there was but one "sibyl of old Rome" (the Cumaean), who offered to Tarquin the nine Sibylline books.

Sibyl's Books (The) We are told that the sibyl of Cumæ (in Æolis) offered Tarquin nine volumes of predictions for a certain sum of money, but the king, deeming the price exorbitant, refused to purchase them, whereupon she burnt three of the volumes, and next year offered Tarquin the remaining six at the same price. Again he refused, and the sibyl burnt three more. The following year she again returned, and asked the original price for the three which remained. At the advice of the augurs, the king purchased the books, and they were preserved with great care under guardians specially appointed for the purpose.

Her remaining chimes like the sibyl's books, became more precious in an increasing ratio as the preceding ones were destroyed.—P. Fitzgerald The Partisan Family l. 7.

Sic Vos non Vobis (See Vos non Vobis)

Sicilian Bull (The), the brazen bull invented by Perillos for the tyrant Phalaris, as an engine of torture. Perillos himself was the first victim enclosed in the bull.

As the Sicilian bull that rightfully
His cries echoed who had shaped the mould
Did so rebel with the voice of him
Tormented that the brazen monster seemed Pierced through with pain.

Dante Hell xxvii (1300)

Sicilian Vespers (The), the massacre of the French in Sicily, which began at Palermo, March 30, 1282, at the hour of vespers, on Easter Monday. This wholesale slaughter was provoked by the brutal conduct of Charles d'Anjou (the governor) and his soldiers towards the islanders.

A similar massacre of the Danes was made in England on St. Bryce's Day (November 13), 1002.

Another similar slaughter took place at Bruges, March 24, 1302.

* * The Bartholomew Massacre (Aug. 24, 1572) was a religious not a political movement.

Sicilian (Le) or L'AMOUR PEINTRE, a comedy by Molière (1667). The Sicilian is don Pedre, who has a Greek slave named Isidore. This slave is loved by Adraste (2 syl), a French gentleman, and the plot of the comedy turns on the way that the Frenchman allures the Greek slave away from her master. Hearing that his friend Damon is going to make a portrait of Isidore, he gets him to write to don Pedre a letter of introduction, requesting that the bearer may be allowed to take the likeness. By this ruse, Adraste reveals his love to Isidore, and persuades her to elope. The next step is this: Zaïde (2 syl), a young slave, pretends to have been ill-treated by Adraste, and runs to don Pedre to crave protection. The don bids her go in, while he intercedes with Adraste on her behalf. The Frenchman seems to relent, and Pedre calls for Zaïde to come forth, but Isidore comes instead, wearing Zaïde's veil. Don Pedre says to Adraste, "There, take her home, and use her well!" "I will," says Adraste, and leads off the Greek slave.

Sicily of Spain (The) Alemtejo, in Portugal, was so called at one time. In the Middle Ages, Alemtejo was "the granary of Portugal."

Sick Man of the East (The), the Turkish empire. It was Nicholas of Russia who gave this name to the moribund empire.

We have on our hands a sick man, a very sick man. It would be a great misfortune if one of these days he should happen to die before the necessary arrangements are all made. The man is certainly dying, and we must not allow such an event to take us by surprise.—Nicholas of Russia, to Sir George Seymour, British chargé d'affaires (January 11 1844).

Siddhartha, born at Gaya, in India, and known in Indian history as Buddha (i.e. "The Wise").

Sidney, the tutor and friend of Charles Egerton McSycephiant. He loves Constantia, but conceals his passion for fear of paining Egerton, her accepted lover.—C. Macklin, The Man of the World (1764).

Sidney (Sir Philip) Sir Philip Sidney, though suffering extreme thirst from the agony of wounds received in the battle of Zutphen, gave his own draught of water to a wounded private lying at his side, saying, "Poor fellow, thy necessity is greater than mine."

A similar instance is recorded of Alexander "the Great," in the desert of Gedrosia.

David, fighting against the Philistines, became so parched with thirst that he cried out, "Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate!" And the three mighty men broke through the host of the Philistines and brought him water, nevertheless, he would not drink it, but poured it out unto the Lord.—2 Sam. xxiii. 15-17

Siebel, Margherita's rejected lover, in the opera of Faust e Margherita, by Gounod (1859)

Siege Mon siège est fait, my opinion is fixed, and I cannot change it. This proverb rose thus. The abbe de Vertot wrote the history of a certain siege, and applied to a friend for some geographical particulars. These particulars did not arrive till the matter had passed the press, so the abbe remarked with a shrug, "Bah! mon siège est fait."

Siege Perilous (The) The Round Table contained sieges for 150 knights, but three of them were "reserved." Of these, two were posts of honour, but the third was reserved for him who was destined to achieve the quest of the holy grail. This seat was called "perilous," because if any one sat therein except he for whom it was reserved, it would be his death. Every seat of the table bore the name of its rightful occupant in letters of gold, and the name on the "Siege Perilous" was sir Galahad (son of sir Launcelot and Elaine).

Said Merlin "There shall no man sit in the two void places but they that shall be of most worship. But in the Siege Perilous there shall no man sit but one, and if any other be so hardy as to do it, he shall be destroyed."—Pt. I. 48.

Then the old man made sir Galahad unarm, and he put on him a coat of red sandel with a mantel upon his shoulder furred with fine ermines, and he brought him unto the Siege Perilous, when he sat beside sir Launcelot. And the good old man lifted up the cloth and found there these words written THE SIEGE OF SIR GALAHAD—Sir T. Malory History of Prince Arthur III. 22 (1470).

Siege of Calais, a novel by Mde. de Tenein (1681-1749). George Colman has a drama with the same title.

Siege of Damascus Damascus was besieged by the Arabs, while Eumenés was governor. The general of the Syrians was Phœyas, and of the Arabs Calad. Phœyas asked Eumenés's permission to marry his daughter Eudœia, but was sternly refused. After gaining several victories, he fell into the hands of the Arabs, and then joined them in their siege, in order to revenge himself on Eumenés. Eudœia fell into his power, but she refused to marry a traitor. Calad requested Phœyas to point out to him the governor's tent, on being refused, they fought, and Calad fell. Abudah, being now chief in command, made an honourable peace with the Syrians, Phœyas died, and Eudœia retired to a convent.—J. Hughes, Siege of Damascus (1720).

Siege of Rhodes, by sir W. Davenant (1656)

Sieg'fried [Seeq freed], hero of pt. 1 of the Nibelungen Lied, the old German epic. Siegfried was a young warrior of peerless strength and beauty, invulnerable except in one spot between his shoulders. He vanquished the Nibelungs, and earned away their immense hoards of gold and precious stones. He wooed and won Kriemhild, the sister of Günther king of Burgundy, but was treacherously killed by Hagan, while stooping for a draught of water after a hunting expedition.

Siegfried had a cape or cloak, which rendered him invisible, the gift of the dwarf Alberich, and his sword, called Balmung, was forged by Wieland, blacksmith of the Teutonic gods.

This epic consists of a number of different lays by the old minnesingers, pieced together into a connected story as early as 1210. It is of Scandinavian origin, and is in the Younger Edda, amongst the "Völsunga Sagas" (compiled by Snorri, in the thirteenth century).

Siegfried's Birthplace He was born in Phinecastle, then called Xanton.

Siegfried's Father and Mother Siegfried was the youngest son of Siegmund and Sieglind, king and queen of the Netherlands.

Siegfried called Horny He was called horny because when he slew the dragon, he bathed in its blood, and became covered with a horny hide which was invulnerable. A linden leaf happened to fall on his back between his shoulder-blades, and as the blood did not touch this spot, it remained vulnerable.—The minnesingers, The Nibelungen Lied (1210).

Siegfried von Lindenberg, the hero of a comic German romance, by Müller (1779). Still popular and very amusing.

Sieglind [Seeg lind], the mother of Siegfried, and wife of Siegmund king of the Netherlands.—The minnesingers, The Nibelungen Lied (1210).

Siegmund [Seeg mund], king of the Netherlands. His wife was Sieglind, and his son Siegfried [Seeg freed].—The minnesingers, The Nibelungen Lied (1210).

Sieve (The Trial of the) When a vestal was charged with unchastity, she was condemned to carry water from the Tiber in a sieve without spilling any. If she succeeded, she was pronounced innocent, but if any of the water ran out, it was a confirmation of her guilt.

Sieve and Shears, a method of discovering a thief. The modus operandi is as follows.—A sieve is nicely balanced by the points of shears touching the rim, and the shears are supported on the tips of the fingers while a passage of the Bible is read, and the apostles Peter and Paul are asked whether so-and-so is the culprit. When the thief's name is uttered, the sieve spins round. Theocritus mentions this way of divination in his Idyll, III, and Bea Jonson alludes to it.

Searching for things lost with a sieve and shears.—The Alchemist I. 1 (1610).

Sigero, "the Good," slain by Argantes. Argantes hurled his spear at Godfrey, but it struck Sigero, who "rejoiced to suffer in his sovereign's place"—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, xi (1576).

Sight Nine things are necessary before the form of anything can be discerned by the eye: (1) a power to see, (2) light, (3) a visible object, (4) not too small, (5) not too rare, (6) not too near, (7) not too remote, (8) clear space, (9) sufficient time.—See Sir John Davies, Immortality of the Soul, xiv (1622).

Sightly (Captain), a dashing young officer, who runs away with Priscilla Tomboy, but subsequently obtains her guardian's consent to marry her.—The Rump (altered from Bickerstaff's Love in the City).

Sigismunda, daughter of Tancred king of Salerno. She fell in love with Guiscardo her father's squire, revealed to him her love, and married him in a cavern attached to the palace. Tancred discovered them in each other's embrace, and gave secret orders to waylay the bridegroom and strangle him. He then went to Sigismunda, and reproved her for her degrading choice, which she boldly justified. Next day, she received a human heart in a gold casket, knew instinctively that it was Guiscardo's, and poisoned herself. Her father being sent for, she survived just long enough to request that she might be buried in the same grave as her young husband, and Tancred.

Sigismund, emperor of Austria.—Sir W. Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV.).

Sigismunda, daughter of Siffrid, lord high chancellor of Sicily, and betrothed to count Tancred. When king Roger died, he left the crown of Sicily to Tancred, on condition that he married Constantia, by which means the rival lines would be united, and the country saved from civil war. Tancred gave a tacit consent, intending to obtain a dispensation, but Sigismunda, in a moment of wounded pride, consented to marry earl Osmond. When king Tancred obtained an interview with Sigismunda, to explain his conduct, Osmond challenged him, and they fought. Osmond fell, and when his wife ran to him, he thrust his sword into her and killed her.—J. Thomson, Tancred and Sigismunda (1745).

* * This tragedy is based on "The Baneful Marriage," an episode in Gil Blas, founded on fact.

Sigismunda, the heroine of Cervantes's last work of fiction. This tale is a tissue of episodes, full of most incredible adventures, astounding prodigies, impossible characters, and extravagant sentiments. It is said that Cervantes himself preferred it to his Don Quixote, just as Corneille preferred Nicomede to his Cid, and Milton Paradise Regained to his Paradise Lost — Encyc. Brit., Art. "Romance."

Sigurd, the hero of an old Scandinavian legend. Sigurd discovered Brynhild, encased in complete armour, lying in a death-like sleep, to which she had been condemned by Odin. Sigurd woke her by ripping up her corselet, fell in love with her, promised to marry her, but deserted her for Gudrun. This ill-starred union was the cause of an Iliad of woes.

An analysis of this romance was published by Weber in his Illustrations of Northern Antiquities (1810).

Sijl (Al), the recording angel.

On that day we will roll up the heavens as the angel Al Sijl roll'd up the scroll wherein every man's actions are recorded. — tl Fordn. xxi.

Sikes (Bill), a burglar, and one of Lagin's associates. Bill Sikes was a hardened, irreclaimable villain, but had a conscience which almost drove him mad after the murder of Nancy, who really loved him (ch. xlviii). Bill Sikes (1 syl) had an ill-conditioned savage dog, the beast-image of his master, which he kicked and loved, ill-treated and fondled — C. Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837).

The French "Bill Sikes" is "Jean Hirou," a creation of Henri Monnier.

Sikundra (The), a mausoleum about six miles from Agra, raised by Akhbar "the Great," in the reign of our Charles I.

Silence, a country justice of asinine dulness when sober, but when in his cups of most uproarious mirth. He was in the commission of the peace with his cousin Robert Shallow.

"I swear," I did not think Master Silence had been a man of this mettle.

"Hence! Who I? I have been merry twice and once ere now — Shakespeare 2 Henry VI act v sc 3 (l. 93)

Sile'no, husband of Mysis, a kind-hearted man, who takes pity on Apollo when cast to earth by Jupiter, and gives him a home — Kane O'Hara, Alidas (1764).

Silent (The), William I. prince of Orange (1583-1584). It was the principle of Napoleon III. emperor of the French to "hear, see, and say nothing."

Silent Man (The), the barber of Bagdad, the greatest chatteringbox that ever lived. Being sent for to shave the head and beard of a young man who was to visit the cadi's daughter at noon, he kept him from daybreak to midday, prating, to the unspeakable annoyance of the customer. Being subsequently taken before the caliph, he ran on telling story after story about his six brothers. He was called the "Silent Man," because on one occasion, being accidentally taken up with ten robbers, he never said he was not one of the gang. His six brothers were Baeboe the hunchback, Bakbarah the toothless, Bakne the one-eyed, Aleonz the blind, Alna-char the careless, and Schacabae the hare-lipped — Arabian Nights ("The Barber," and "The Barber's Six Brothers").

Silent Woman (The), a comedy by Ben Jonson (1609). Morose, a miserly old fellow, who hates to hear any voice but his own, has a young nephew, sir Dauphine, who wants to wring from him a third of his property, and the way he gains his point is this. He induces a lad to pretend to be a "silent woman." Morose is so delighted with the phenomenon that he consents to marry the prodigy, but the moment the ceremony is over, the boy-wife assumes the character of a virago, whose tongue is a ceaseless clack. Morose is in despair, and signs away a third of his property to his nephew, on condition of being rid of this intolerable pest. The trick is now revealed, Morose retires into private life, and sir Dauphine remains master of the situation.

Sile'nus, son of Pan, chief of the sile'ni or older satyrs. Silēnus was the foster-father of Bacchus the wine-god, and is described as a jovial old toper, with bald head, pug nose, and pimply face.

Old Silenus bleated drunken

Led by his inebriate satyrs.

Longfellow Drinking Song

Silhouette (3 syl), a black profile. So called from Etienne de Silhouette, contrôleur des finances under Louis XV. (1757).

Les réformes financières de ce ministre ayant paru mesquines et ridicules la caricature s'en empara, et l'on donna le nom de Silhouettes à ces dessins imparfaits où l'on se bornait à indiquer par un simple trait le contour des objets.

Silky, a Jew money-lender, swindler, and miser. (See SULKY.)

You phet all day tremble at night and act the hypocrite by fir'ing things in the morning — T. Holcroft, 2^d lead to Pulln, II. 3 (1792).

Silly Billy, William IV (1765, 1830-1837)

Silures (3 syl), the inhabitants of Siluria, that is, Herefordshire, Monmouthshire, Radnorshire, Brecon, and Glamorganshire

Those Silures, called by us the South Wales men
Dryden Polyolbion xvi (1613)

Silva (Don Ruy Gomez de), an old Spanish grandee, to whom Elvira was betrothed, but she detested him, and loved Ernani, a bandit-captain. Charles V tried to seduce her, and Silva, in his wrath, joined Ernani to depose the king. The plot being discovered, the conspirators were arrested, but, at the intercession of Elvira, were pardoned. The marriage of Ernani and Elvira was just about to be consummated, when a horn sounded. Ernani had hound himself, when Silva joined the bandit, to put an end to his life whenever summoned so to do by Silva, and the summons was to be given by the blast of a horn. Silva being relentless, Ernani kept his vow, and stabbed himself—Verdi, Ernani (1841)

Silver Age (The), the age succeeding the golden, and succeeded by the iron age. The best period of the world or of a nation is its golden age, noted for giants of literature, simplicity of manners, integrity of conduct, honesty of intention, and domestic virtues. The Elizabethan was the golden age of England. The silver age of a people is noted for its elegant refinement, its delicacy of speech, its luxurious living, its politeness and artificial manners. The reign of Anne was the silver age of England. The iron age is that of commerce and hard matter-of-fact. Birth is no longer the one thing needful, but hard cash, the romance of life has died out, and iron and coals are the philosopher's stone. The age of Victoria is the iron age of England. Strange that the three ages should all be the reigns of queens!

Silver Code (The), a translation into Gothic of parts both of the Old and New Testaments by bishop Ulfilas, in the eighth century. Still extant.

Silver-Fork School (The), a name given to a class of English novelists who gave undue importance to etiquette and the externals of social intercourse. The most distinguished are Lady Blessington (1789-1849), Theodore Hook (1716-1796), Lord Lytton (1801-1873), Mrs Trollope (1790-1863), and Lord Beaconsfield,

Silver Pen Eliza Meteyard was so called by Douglas Jerrold, and she adopted the pseudonym (1816-1879)

Silver Spoon. Born with a silver spoon in your mouth means born to good luck. The allusion is to the silver spoons given as prizes and at christenings. The lucky man is born with the prize in his mouth, and does not need to wait for it or to earn it.

Silver Star of Love (The), the star which appeared to Vasco da Gama when his ships were tempest-tossed through the malice of Bacchus. Immediately the star appeared, the tempest ceased, and there was a great calm.

The sky and ocean blending, each on fire
Seemed as all Nature struggled to expire
When now the Silver Star of Love appeared Bright in the east her radiant front she reared Camœns Lusad vi. (1572).

Silver-Tongued (The), Joshua Sylvester, translator of Du Bartas's Divine Weeks and Works (1563-1618)

William Bates, a puritan divine (1625-1699)

Henry Smith, preacher (1550-1600)

Anthony Hammond, the poet, called "Silver Tongue" (1668-1738)

Spranger Barry, the "Irish Roseus" (1719-1777)

Silver Wedding (The), the twenty-fifth anniversary, the fiftieth anniversary is the golden wedding. In Germany those persons who attain the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding day are presented by their friends and family with a wreath of silver flowers, and on the fiftieth anniversary with a wreath of gold flowers. The fifth anniversary is the wooden wedding, and the seventy-fifth the diamond wedding. Sometimes the Wedding Service is repeated on the fiftieth anniversary.

In 1879 William king of Prussia and emperor of Germany celebrated his golden wedding.

Silverquill (Sam), one of the prisoners at Portanferry—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Silves de la Selva (The Exploits and Adventures of), part of the series called Le Roman des Romans, pertaining to "Amadis of Gaul." This part was added by Feliciano de Silva.

Silvestre (2 syl), valet of Octavo (son of Argante and brother of Zerbinette)—Molière, Les Fourberies de Scapin (1671).

Sil'via, daughter of the duke of Milan, and the lady-love of Valentine one of the heroes of the play—Shakespeare, The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1591)

Simmons (Wido c), the seamstress, a neighbour of the Ramsays—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Simon (Martin), proprietor of the village Bout du Monde, and miller of Grenoble. He is called "The king of Pekout," and in reality is the baron de Peyras, who has given up all his estates to his nephew, the young chevalier Marcellin de Peyras, and retired to Grenoble, where he lived as a villager. Martin Simon is in secret possession of a gold-mine left him by his father, with the stipulation that he should place it beyond the reach of any private man on the day it became a "source of woe and crime." Fabiusson, a travelling tinker, the only person who knows about it, being murdered, Simon is suspected, but Lucie Noel confesses the crime. Simon then makes the mine over to the king of France, as it had proved the source both "of woe and crime"—J Stirling, The Gold-Mine of Miller of Grenoble (1861)

Simon Pure, a young quaker from Pennsylvania, on a visit to Obadiah Primi (a Bristol quaker, and one of the guardians of Anne Lovel's heiress). Colonel Leignwell personated Simon Pure, and obtained Obadiah's consent to marry his ward. When the real Simon Pure presented himself, the colonel denounced him as an impostor, but after he had obtained the guardians' signature, he confessed the trick, and showed how he had obtained the consent of the other three guardians—Mrs Centlivre, A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1717)

 This name has become a household word for "the real man," the ipsissimus ego

Si'mome or Si'ton, the friar, in the best-epic of Reynard the Fox (1496). So called from Simon Magus (Acts viii 9-24)

Simony (Dr), in Foote's farce called The Coenobites, was meant for Dr Dodd

Sim'org, a word "which hath seen the world thrice destroyed." It is found in Kâf, but, as Hafiz says, "searching for the simorg is like searching for the philosopher's stone." This does not agree with Beckford's account (see SIMURGH).

In Kâf the simorg hath its dwelling place,
The all knowing bird of ages, who hath seen
The world with all its children thrice destroyed.
Southey Thalaba the Destroyer vlll 19 (1797)

Simpcox (Saunder), a lame man, who asserted he was born blind, and to whom St Alban said, "Come, offer at my shrine, and I will help thee." Being brought before Humphrey duke of Gloucester, the lord protector, he was asked how he became lame, and Simpcox replied he fell from a tree, which he had climbed to gather plums for his wife. The duke then asked if his sight had been restored? "Yes," said the man, and being shown divers colours, could readily distinguish between red, blue, brown, and so on. The duke told the rascal that a blind man does not climb trees to gather their fruits, and one born blind might, if his sight were restored, know that one colour differed from another, but could not possibly know which was which. He then placed a stool before him, and ordered the constables to whip him till he jumped over it, whereon the lame man jumped over it, and ran off as fast as his legs could carry him. Sir Thomas More tells this story, and Shakespeare introduces it in 2 Henry IV act ii sc 1 (1591)

Simple, the servant of Slender (cousin of justice Shallow)—Shakespeare, The Merry Wives of Windsor (1596)

Simple (The), Charles III of France (879, 893-929)

Simple (Peter), the hero and title of a novel by captain Marryat (1833)

Simple Simon, a man more sinned against than sinning, whose misfortunes arose from his wife Margery's cruelty, which began the very morning of their marriage

1784) This does not agree with Southey's account (see SIMORG)

Sin, twin-keeper, with Death, of Hell-gate She sprang, full-grown, from the head of Satan

Woman to the waist, and fair
But ending foul in many a scaly fold
Voluminous and vast, a serpent armed
With mortal sting
Milton Paradise Lost II. (1665)

Sin'adone (The lady of), metamorphosed by enchantment into a serpent Sir Lybius (one of Arthur's knights) slew the enchantress, and the serpent, coiling about his neck, kissed him, whereupon the spell was broken, the serpent became a lovely princess, and sir Lybius made her his wife — Libeaux (a romance)

Sindbad, a merchant of Bagdad, who acquired great wealth by merchandize He went seven voyages, which he related to a poor discontented porter named Hindbad, to show him that wealth must be obtained by enterprise and personal exertion

First Voyage Being becalmed in the Indian Ocean, he and some others of the crew visited what they supposed to be an island, but which was in reality a huge whale asleep They lighted a fire on the whale, and the boat wole the creature, which instantly dived under water Sindbad was picked up by some merchants, and in due time returned home

Second Voyage Sindbad was left, during sleep, on a desert island, and discovered a roe's egg, "fifty paces in circumference" He fastened himself to the claw of the bird, and was deposited in the valley of diamonds Next day, some merchants came to the top of the crags, and threw into the valley huge joints of raw meat, to which the diamonds stuck, and when the eagles picked up the meat, the merchants scared them from their nests, and carried off the diamonds Sindbad fastened himself to a piece of meat, was carried by an eagle to its nest, and being rescued by the merchants, returned home laden with diamonds

Third Voyage is the encounter with the Cyclops (See ULYSSES AND POLYPHEMOS, where the account is given in detail)

Fourth Voyage Sindbad married a lady of rank in a strange island on which he was cast, and when his wife died, he was buried alive with the dead body, according to the custom of the land He made his way out of the catacomb, and returned to Bagdad, greatly enriched by valuables rifled from the dead bodies

Fifth Voyage The ship in which he sailed was dashed to pieces by huge stones let down from the talons of two angry roes Sindbad swam to a desert island, where he threw stones at the monkeys, and the monkeys threw back cocon-nuts On this island Sindbad encountered and killed the Old Man of the Sea

Sixth Voyage Sindbad visited the island of Serendib (or Ceylon), and climbed to the top of the mountain "where Adam was placed on his expulsion from paradise"

Seventh Voyage He was attacked by corsairs, sold to slavery, and employed in shooting elephants from a tree He discovered a tract of hill country completely covered with elephants' tusks, communicated his discovery to his master, obtained his liberty, and returned home — Arabian Nights ("Sindbad the Sailor")

Singe de Racine (Le), Campistron, the French dramatic poet (1656-1723)

Singing Apple (The), in the deserts of Libya This apple resembled a ruby crowned with a huge diamond, and had the gift of imparting wit to those who only smelt of it Prince Chery obtained it for Fairstar (See SINGING TREE)

The singing apple is as great an embellisher of wit as the dancing water is of beauty Would you appear in public as a poet or prose writer a wit or a philosopher you only need smell it, and you are possessed at once of the rare gifts of genius — Comtesse D'Amoy Fairy Tales ("Princess Fairstar" 165.)

Singing Tree (The), a tree, every leaf of which was a mouth, and all the leaves sang together in harmonious concert — Arabian Nights ("The Two Sisters," the last story)

* * In the tale of Chery and Fairstar "the singing tree" is called "the singing apple" (q v)

Single-Speech Hamilton, William Gerard Hamilton, statesman (1729-1796) His first speech was delivered November 13, 1775, and his eloquence threw into the shade every orator except Pitt himself

It was supposed that he had exhausted himself in that one speech and had become physically incapable of making a second, so that afterwards when he really did make a second, everybody was naturally disgusted and most people dropped his acquaintance.—Do Quincey (1786-18.2)

Simon or SIMONS, a Corinthian robber, called "The Pine-Bender," because he fastened his victims to the branches of two adjacent pine trees bent down by force, being then left to rebound, they tore the victim to pieces—Greek Fable

In Stephen's reign, we are told, "the barons took those supposed to have any property, and inflicted on them unutterable tortures. Some they hanged up by the feet, and smoked with foul smoke, some they hung by the thumbs, and weighted with coats of mail. They tied knotted cords about the heads of others, and twisted the cords till the pain went to the brains, others they kept in dungeons with adders and snakes. Some they tore in pieces by fastening them to two trees, and some they placed in a crucet house, i.e. a chest short and narrow, in which were spikes the victims being forced into the chest, all their limbs were crushed and broken"—Ingram, Saxon Chronicle

Sinner Saved (A) Cyra daughter of Proterius of Cappadocia was on the point of taking the veil among Emmelia's sisterhood, and just before the day of renunciation, Eleemon, her father's freed slave, who loved her, sold himself to the devil, on condition of obtaining her for his wife. He signed the bond with a drop of his heart's blood, and earned about with him a little red spot on his breast, as a perpetual reminder of the compact. The devil now sent a dream to Cyra, and another to her father, which caused them to change their plans, and on the very day that Cyra was to have taken the veil, she was given by St Basil in marriage to Eleemon, with whom she lived happily for many years, and had a large family. One night while her husband was asleep, Cyra saw the blood-red spot, she knew what it meant, and next day Eleemon told her the whole story. Cyra now bestirred herself to annul the compact, and went with her husband to St Basil, to whom a free and full confession was made. Eleemon was shut up for a night in a cell, and Satan would have carried him off, but he clung to the foot of a crucifix. Next day, Satan met St Basil in the cathedral, and demanded his bond. St Basil assured him the bond was illegal and invalid. The devil was foiled, the red mark vanished from the skin of Eleemon, a sinner was saved, and St Basil came off victorious.—Amphilochius, Life of St Basil (See Rosweyde, Vita Patrum, 156-8)

Sirocco, a wind, called the solano in Spain, the khamsin in Egypt, the simoom in Western Asia, and the harmattan on the coast of Guinea. The Italians say of a stupid book, Era scritto in tempo dal sirocco ("It was written during the sirocco")

Sister Anne, sister of Fatima (the seventh and last wife of Bluebeard). Fatima, being condemned to death by her tyrannical husband, requested sister Anne to ascend to the highest tower of the castle to watch for her brothers, who were momentarily expected. Bluebeard kept roaring below stairs for Fatima to be quick, Fatima was constantly calling out from her chamber, "Sister Anne, do you see them coming?" and sister Anne was on the watch-tower, mistaking every cloud of dust for the mounted brothers. They arrived at last, rescued Fatima, and put Bluebeard to death — Charles Periault, Contes ("La Barbe Bleue," 1697)

Sisyphos, in Latin Sisyphus, a king of Corinth, noted for his avarice and fraud. He was punished in the infernal regions by having to roll uphill a huge stone, which always rolled down again as soon as it reached the top. Sisyphos is a type of avarice, never satisfied. The avaricious man reaches the summit of his ambition, and no sooner does he so than he finds the object of his desire as far off as ever

With many a weary step and many a groan
Up the high hill he heaves a huge round stone
The huge round stone, returning with a bound Thunders impetuous down and smokes along the ground
Homer Odyssey xi. (100 s. trans.)

Sisyphus, in the Milesian tales, was doomed to die, but when Death came to him, the wily fellow contrived to fasten the unwelcome messenger in a chair, and then feasted him till old Spare-ribs grew as fat as a prize pig. In time, Pluto released Death, and Sisyphus was caught, but prayed that he might speak to his wife before he went to hadēs. The prayer was granted, and Sisyphus told his wife not to bury him, for though she might think him dead, he would not be really so. When he got to the infernal regions, he made the ghosts so merry with his jokes that Pluto reproved him, and Sisyphus pleaded that, as he had not been buried, Pluto had no jurisdiction over him, nor could he even be ferried across the Styx. He then obtained leave to return to earth, that he might persuade his wife to bury him. Now, the wily old king had previously bribed Hermēs, when he took him to hadēs, to induce Zeus to grant him life, provided he returned to earth again in the body, when, therefore, he did return, he demanded of Hermēs the fulfilment of his promise, and Hermēs induced Zeus to bestow on him life. Sisyphus was now allowed to return to earth, with a promise that he should never die again till he himself implored for death. So he lived and lived till he was weary of living, and when he went to hadēs the second time, he was allotted, by way of punishment, the task of rolling a huge stone to the top of a mountain. Orpheus (2 syl.) asked him how he could endure so ceaseless and vain an employment, and Sisyphus replied "that he hoped ultimately to accomplish the task." "Never," exclaimed Orpheus, "it can never be done!" "Well, then," said Sisyphus, "mine is at worst but everlasting hope" — Lord Lytton, Tales of Miletus, i.

Sitophagus ("the wheat-eater"), one of the mouse princes, who, being wounded in the battle, crept into a ditch to avoid further injury or danger

The lame Sitophagus oppressed with pain
Creeps from the desperate dangers of the plain
And where the ditches rising weeds supply
There lurks the silent mouse relieved of heat,
And safe embowered avoids the chance of fate
Farrell Battle of the Frogs and Mice iii. (about 1712)

The last two lines might be amended thus

There he lies the trembling moine with bristled breath,
And, h'd from sight, avoids his instant death.

Siward [Se ward], the earl of Northumberland, and general of the English forces acting against Macbeth—Shakespeare, Macbeth (1606)

Six Chronicles (The) Dr Giles compiled and edited six Old English Chronicles for Bolin's series in 1818. They are Ethelwerd's Chronicle, Asser's Life of Alfred, Geoffrey of Monmouth's British History, Gildas the Wise's Nennius's History of the Britons, and Pichard of Cirencester On the Ancient State of Britain. The last three were edited, in 1757, by professor Bertram, in his Scriptores Træs, but great doubt exists on the genuineness of Dr. Bertram's compilation (See THREE WRITERS)

Skettles (Sir Barnet), of Fulham. He expressed his importance by an antique gold snuff-box and silk handkerchief. His hobby was to extend his acquaintances, and to introduce people to each other. Skettles, junior, was a pupil of Dr Blumber—C Dickens, Dombey and Son (1816)

Skewington's Daughter, an instrument of torture in vogue by Skewington, lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Henry VIII. It consisted of a broad iron hoop, in two parts, jointed with a hinge. The victim was put into the hoop, which was then squeezed close and locked. Here he remained for about an hour and a half in the most inexpressible torture. (Generally corrupted into the "Seavenger's Daughter")

Skewton (The Hon Mrs), mother of Judith (Mr Dombey's second wife). Having once been a beauty, she painted when old and shrivelled, became enthusiastic about the "charms of nature," and reclined in her bath-chair in the attitude she assumed in her baronche when young and well off. A fashionable artist had painted her likeness in this attitude, and called his picture "Cleopatra." The Hon Mrs Skewton was the sister of the late Lord Feenix, and aunt to the present lord—C. Dickens, Dombey and Son (1816)

Skies, snobs, blackguards. At Westminster School the boys call themselves Romans, and the "town" Volsci, contracted into 'sci', and corrupted into "skies."

Skulnewhitter (Andrew), the scrivener—Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel (time, James I)

Sky-Lark, a lark with the "skies" or 'seis The Westminster boys used to style themselves Romans, and the "town" Volsci, the latter word was curtailed to 'sci [sky] A row between the Westminsterians and the town roughs was called a 'sci-lar' or a lark with the Volsci

Skyresh Bol'golam, the high admiral or galbet of the realm of Lilliput—Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," in, 1726)

S L Laud ordered William Prynne to be branded on both cheeks with the letters S L, meaning "Schismatic libeller," but Prynne insisted that the letters stood for Stigmata Laudis ("Laud's disgrace")

Slackbridge, one of the "hands" in Bonnderby's mill at Coketown Slackbridge is an ill-conditioned fellow, ill made, with lowering eyebrows, and though inferior to many of the others, exercises over them a great influence He is the orator, who stirs up his fellow-workmen to strike—C Dickens, Hard Times (1851)

Slammerkin (Mrs) Captain Macheath says of her, "She is careless and genteel" "All you fine ladies," he adds, "who know your own beauty, affect an undress"—Gay, The Beggar's Opera, II 1 (1727)

Slander, an old hag, of "ragged, rude attire, and filthy lockes," who sucked venom out of her nails It was her nature to abuse all goodness, to frame groundless charges, to "sterile away the crowne of a good name," and "never thing so well was doon, but she with blame would blot, and of due praise deprive"

A foule and loathly creature sure in sight
And in conditions to be loathed no lesse
For she was stuf with rancour and despite
Up to the throat, that oft with bitterness
It forth would breake and gush in great excess

Sclauder"

Spenser Fairy Queen IV viii. 24 (1596).

Slang, from Slangenberg, a Dutch general, noted for his abusive and exaggerated epithets when he reproved the men under his command The etymon is suited to this dictionary, and the following are not without wit—Italian, s-lingua, s negative and lingua = "bad language," French, esclandre, "an event which gives rise to scandal," hence, faire esclandre, "to expose one to scandal," causer de l'esclandre, "to give ground for scandal," Greek, skandālon, "an offence, a scandal" "Slangs," fetters for malefactors,

Slango, a lad, servant of Gaylove a young barrister. He dresses up as a woman, and when squire Sapskull comes from Yorkshire for a wife, Slango passes himself off as Arbella. In the mean time, Gaylove assumes the airs and manners of a Yorkshire tike, and marries Arbella, with whom he is in love—Carey, The Honest Yorkshireman (1736)

Slawken-Ber'gus (Hafen), an inn-keeper, author, distinguished for the great length of his nose. In the Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (by Sterne), Slawken-Bergus is referred to as a great authority on all lore connected with noses, and a curious tale is introduced from his hypothetical works about a man with an enormously long nose.

No nose can be justly attributed by the poet to the nose of Slawken Bergus himself—Carlyle Slaygood (Guant), master of a gang of thieves which infested the King's highway. Mr. Greatheart slew him, and rescued Leebelmind from his grasp in a duel—Banyan, Pilgrim's Progress, II (1651)

Sleary, proprietor of the circus at Colerown. A stout man, with one eye fixed and one loose, a voice like the efforts of a broken pair of bellows, a flabby skin, and muddled head. He was never sober and never drunk, but always kind-hearted. Tom Gradgrind, after robbing the burl, lay concealed in this circus as a black servant, till Sleary connived at his escape. This Sleary did in gratitude to Thomas Gradgrind, Esq., M.P., who adopted and educated Cecilia Lupe, daughter of his clown, signor Jupe.

Josephine Sleary, daughter of the circus proprietor, a pretty girl of 18, who had been tied on a horse at two years old, and had made a will at 12. This will she carried about with her, and in it she signified her desire to be drawn to the grave by two piebald ponies. Josephine married E. W. B. Childers of her father's circus—C. Dickens, Hard Times (1854)

Sleek (Ammadab), in The Serious Family, a comedy by Morris Barnett

Sleeper (The). Almost all nations have a tradition about some sleeper, who will wake after a long period of dormancy.

American (North) RIP VAN WINKLE, a Dutch colonist of New York, slept twenty years in the Katskill Mountains of North America—Washington Irving

American (South) STANSLIAH I, supposed to have fallen in the battle of Alcazarquebir, in 1578, is only asleep, and will in due time awake, return to life, and make Brazil the chief kingdom of the earth.

Arabian Legends MUHAMMAD MONADI, the twelfth imâm, is only sleeping, like Charlemagne, till Antichrist appears, when he will awake in his strength, and overthrow the great enemy of all true believers.

NOUJUMAD is only in a temporary sleep, waiting the fulness of time.

British Traditions RING ARTHUR is not dead in Avallon, but is merely metamorphosed into a raven. In due time he will awake, resume his proper person, claim the throne of Britain, and make it the head and front of all the kingdoms of the globe. "Because king Arthur bears for the nonce the semblance of a raven, the people of Britain never kill a raven" (Cervantes, Don Quixote, I. II. 5).

GUINIVR slept 600 years by the enchantment of Merlin. She was the natural daughter of king Arthur and Guendolen, and was thus punished because she would not put an end to a combat in which twenty nights were mortally wounded, including Merlin's son—Sir W. Scott, Bridal of Tournai (1813).

MIRIAM, the enchanter, is not dead, but "sleeps and sighs in an old tree, spell-bound by Vivien"—British Legend

ST DAVID was thrown into an enchanted sleep by Ormandine, but after sleeping for seven years, was awake by Merlin.

French Legend The French slain in the SIGUR YRSIUS are not really dead, but they sleep for the time being, awaiting the day of retribution.

German Legends BARBAROSSA with six of his knights sleep in Kyffhäuserberg, in Thuringia, till the fulness of time, when they will awake and make Germany the foremost kingdom of the earth. "The beard of the red king has already grown through the table slab at which he is sitting, but it must wind itself three times round the table before his second advent. Barbarossa occasionally wakes and asks, "Is it time?" when a voice replies, "Not yet. Sleep on."

CHARLEMAGNE is not dead, but only asleep in Untersberg, near Salzburg, waiting for the advent of Antichrist, when he will rouse from his slumber, go forth conquering, and will deliver Christendom that it may be fit for the second advent and personal reign of Christ

CHARLES V kaiser of Germany is only asleep, waiting his time, when he will awake, return to earth, "resume the monarchy over Germany, Portugal, Spain, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Denmark, putting all enemies under his feet

KALZ LAZAR, of Servia, supposed to have been slain by the Turks in 1389, is not really dead, but has put on sleep for a while, and at an allotted moment he will re-appear in his full strength

Grecian Legends ENDYMION, a beautiful youth, sleeps a perpetual sleep in Latmos Selēnē (the moon) fell in love with him, kissed him, and still lies by his side In the British Museum is an exquisite statue of Endymion asleep — Greek Fable

EPIMENIDIS (5 syl) the Cretan poet was sent in boyhood to search for a stray sheep, being heated and weary, he stepped into a cave, and fell asleep for fifty-seven years Epimenidēs, who are told, attained the age of 154, 157, 229, and some say 289 years — Pliny, History, vii 12

Irish Traditions BRIAN, surnamed "Boromhe," king of Ireland, who conquered the Danes in twenty pitched battles, and was supposed to have been slain in the battle of Clontarf, in 1014, was only stunned He still sleeps in his castle of Kineora, and the day of Ireland's necessity will be Brian's opportunity

DESMOND OR KILMALLOCK, in Limerick, supposed to have perished in the reign of Elizabeth, is only sleeping under the waters of lough Gur Every seventh year he re-appears in full armour, rides round the lake early in the morning, and will ultimately re-appear and claim the family estates — Sir W Scott, Fortunes of Nigel

Jewish Legend ELIJAH the prophet is not dead, but sleeps in Abraham's bosom till Antichrist appears, when he will return to Jerusalem and restore all things

Russian Tradition ELIJAH MANSUR, warrior, prophet, and priest in Asiatic Russia, tried to teach a more tolerant form of Islām, but was looked on as a heretic, and condemned to imprisonment in the bowels of a mountain There he sleeps, waiting patiently the summons which will be given him, when he will awake, and wave his conquering sword to the terror of the Muscovite — Milner, Gallery of Geography, 781

Scandinavian Tradition OLAF TRYGGVASON king of Norway, who was baptized in London, and introduced Christianity into Norway, Iceland, and Greenland Being overthrown by Svolde king of Sweden (A D 1000), he threw himself into the sea and swam to the Holy Land, became an anchorite, and fell asleep at a greatly advanced age, but he is only waiting his opportunity, when he will sever Norway from Sweden, and raise it to a first-class power

Scottish Tradition THOMAS OF ELCHILDOUNE sleeps beneath the Eildon Hills, in Scotland One day, an elfin lady led him into a cavern in these hills, and he fell asleep for seven years, when he revisited the upper earth, under a bond that he would return immediately the elfin lady summoned him One day, as he was making merry with his friends, he heard the summons, kept his word, and has never since been seen — Sir W Scott, Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border

Spanish Tradition BOBADIL EL CHICO, last of the Moorish kings of Granada, lies spell-bound near the Alhambra, but in the day appointed he will return to earth and restore the Moorish government in Spain

Swiss Legend Three of the family of TELL sleep a semi-death at Rütli, waiting for the hour of their country's need, when they will wake up and deliver it

Sleeper Awakened (The) Abou Hassan, the son of a rich merchant at Bagdad, inherited a good fortune, but, being a prudent man, made a vow to divide it into two parts all that came to him from rents he determined to set apart, but all that was of the nature of cash he resolved to spend on pleasure In the course of a year he ran through this fund, and then made a resolve in future to ask only one guest at a time to his board This guest was to be a stranger, and never to be asked a second time It so happened that the caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, disguised as a merchant, was on one occasion his guest, and heard Abou Hassan say that he wished he were caliph for one day, and he would punish a certain imām for tittle-tattling Haroun-al-Raschid thought that he could make capital of this wish for a little diversion, so, drugging the merchant's wine, he fell into a profound sleep, was conveyed to the palace, and on waking was treated as the caliph. He ordered the man to be punished, and sent his mother a handsome gift, but at night, another sleeping draught being given him, he was carried back to his own house. When he woke, he could not decide if he had been in a dream or not, but his conduct was so strange that he was taken to a mad-house. He was confined for several days, and, being discharged, the caliph in disguise again visited him, and repeated the same game, so that next day he could not tell which had been the dream. At length the mystery was cleared up, and he was given a post about the caliph's person, and the sultana gave him a beautiful slave for his wife. Abou Hassan now played a trick on the caliph. He pretended to be dead, and sent his young wife to the sultana to announce the sad news. Zobeida, the sultana, was very much grieved, and gave her favourite a sum of money for the funeral expenses. On her return, she played the dead woman, and Abou Hassan went to the caliph to announce his loss. The caliph expressed his sympathy, and, having given him a sum of money for the funeral expenses, went to the sultana to speak of the sad news of the death of the young bride. "The bride?" cried Zobeida, "you mean the bridegroom, commander of the faithful." "No, I mean the bride," answered the caliph, "for Abou Hassan has but just left me." "That cannot be, sire," retorted Zobeida, "for it is not an hour ago that the bride was here, to announce his death." To settle this moot point, the chief of the eunuchs was sent to see which of the two was dead, and Abou, who saw him coming, got the bride to pretend to be dead, and set himself at her head bewailing, so the man returned with the report that it was the bride who was dead, and not the bridegroom. The sultana would not believe him, and sent her aged nurse to ascertain the fact. As she approached, Abou Hassan pretended to be dead, and the bride to be the wailing widow, accordingly the nurse contradicted the report of the eunuch. The caliph and sultana, with the nurse and eunuch, then all went to see for themselves, and found both apparently dead. The caliph now said he would give 1000 pieces of gold to know which died first, when Abou Hassan cried, "Commander of the faithful, it was I who died first." The trick was found out, the caliph

nearly died with laughter, and the jest proved a little mine of wealth to the court favourite—Arabian Nights

Sleepers (See SEVEN SLEEPERS)

Sleeping Beauty (The), a lady who sleeps in a castle a hundred years, during which time an impenetrable wood springs up around the castle, but being at length disenchanted by a young prince, she marries him. The brothers Grimm have reproduced this tale in German. The old Norse tale of Brynhild and Sigurd seems to be the original of The Sleeping Beauty—Perrault, Contes de Temps ("La Belle au Bois Dormant," 1697).

(Tennyson has poetized this nursery story.)

Sleepner, the horse of Odin

Slender, one of the authors of "sweet Anno Page." His servant's name is Simple. Slender is a country lout, cousin of justice Shallow—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor (1596).

Slender is a perfect satiro on the brilliant youth of the provinces before the introduction of newspapers and turn like roads, awkward and boobyish among civil people, but at home in rule sports and proud of exploits at which the town would laugh—Hallam.

Slender and Sir Andrew Ague-cheek are fools troubled with an uneasy consciousness of their folly which in the latter produces a most edifying meekness and docility and in the former awkwardness, obstinacy and confusion.—Mac. v. i.

Slick (Sam), judge Thomas Chandler Haliburton of Nova Scotia, author of The Clockmaker (1837).

Sam Slick, a Yankee clockmaker and pedlar, wonderfully witty, a great observer, full of quaint ideas, droll wit, odd fancies, surprising illustrations, and plenty of "soft sawder." Judge Haliburton wrote the two series called Sam Slick or the Clockmaker (1837).

Sluderskew (Peg), the hag-like housekeeper of Arthur Grime. She robs her master of some deeds, and thereby brings on his ruin—C. Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838).

Sligo (Dr), of Ireland. He looks with contempt on his countryman, Dr O'Senifras, because he is but a parvenu.

Occasional! That's a name of no note. He is not a Mile-fan I am sure. The family I suppose came over the other day with Strongbow not above seven or eight hundred years ago.—Foots The Devil upon Two Sticks (1769).

Slingsby (Jonathan Treke), John Francis Waller, author of The Slingsby Papers (1852), etc.

Slip, the valet of young Harlowe (son

Francis Holiday the schoolmaster in White Horse Vale

Dickie Stodge or "Flibbertigibbet," her dwarf grandson—Sir W. Scott, Acquiescer (time, Elizabeth)

Slum (Mr), a pitter poet, who dressed in rudians. He called on Mrs Jarley, exhibitor of wax-works, all by accident "What, Mr Slum?" cried the lady of the wax-work, "who'd have thought of seeing you here?" "Pon my soul and honour," said Mr Slum, "that's a good remark! 'Pon my soul and honour, that's a wise remark. Why I came here? 'Pon my soul and honour, I hardly know what I came here for. What a splendid classical thing is this, Mrs Jarley! 'Pon my soul and honour, it is quite Mimærian!" "It'll look well, I fancy," observed Mrs Jarley. "Well!" said Mr Slum, "it would be the delight of my life, 'pon my soul and honour, to exercise my Muse on such a delightful theme. By the way—any orders, madam? Is there anything I can do for you?" (ch. xxviii)

"Ask the person—ask the ordinary gentleman, ask the bookmaker, ask the hater, ask the oil-dresser, ask the expert, ask any man among 'em what poetry has done for him, and making words be blest the name of him"—C. Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1837)

Slumkey (Sam), "blue" candidate for the representation of the borough of Lathamswill in parliament. His opponent is Horatio Firkin, who represents the "buff" in' rest.—C. Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Sly (Christopher), a keeper of bears, and a tinker. In the induction of Shakespeare's comedy called Taming of the Shrew, Christopher is found dazed drunk, by a nobleman, who commands his servants to take him to his mansion and attend on him as a lord. The trick is played, and the "commonalty" of Taming of the Shrew is performed for the delectation of the ephemeral lord.

A similar trick was played by Haroun-al-Raschid on a rich merchant named Abou Hassan (see Arabian Nights, "The Sleeper Awakened"). Also by Philippe le Bon of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleanor (see Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, ii 2, 1, 1621) Slyme (Chevy), one of old Martin Chuzzlewit's numerous relations. He is a drunken, good-for-nothing vagabond, but his friend Montague Tigg considers him "an unappreciated genius." His chief peculiarity consists in his always being "round the corner."—C. Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit (1841)

Small (Gilbert), the pinnaler, a hardworking old man, who loves his son most dearly.

Thomas Small, the son of Gilbert, a would-be man of fashion and macaroni. Very conceited of his fine person, he thinks himself the very glass of fashion. Thomas Small resolves to make a fortune by marriage, and allies himself to Knte, who turns out to be the daughter of Strap the cobbler—S. Knowles, The Beggars of Bethnal Green (1831)

Small Beer (To Chronicle) "to snoble fools, and chronicle small beer" (1ag. 0)—Shakespeare, Othello, act ii sc 1 (1611)

Small Beer Poet (The), W. Thomas Fitzgerald. He is now known only for one line, quoted in the Rejected Addresses. "The tree of freedom is the British oak" Cobbett gave him the sobriquet (1759-1829)

Small-Indians, a "religious sect" in Lilliput, who made it an article of orthodoxy to break their eggs at the small end. By the Small-Indians is meant the protestant party, the Roman Catholics are called the Big-Indians, from their making it a sine qua non for all true Churchmen to break their eggs at the big end.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels ("Voyage to Lilliput," 1726).

Smallweed Family (The), a grasping, ill-conditioned lot, consisting of grandfather, grandmother, and the twins Bartholomew and Judy. The grandfather indulges in vituperative exclamations against his aged wife, with or without provocation, and flings at her anything he can lay his hand on. He becomes, however, so dilapidated at last that he has to be shaken up by his amiable granddaughter Judy in order to be roused to consciousness.

Bartholomew Smallweed, a youth who moulds himself on the model of Mr Guppy, the lawyer's clerk in the office of Kenge and Carbony. He prides himself on being "a humb of the law," though under 15 years of age, indeed, it is reported of him that his first long clothes were made out of a lawyer's blue bag.—C. Dickens, Bleak House (1852).

Sma'trash (Eppie), the nie-woman at Wolf's Hope village.—Sir W. Scott, Bride of Lammermoor (time, William III)

Smauker (John), footman of Angelo Cyrus Bantam. He invites Sam Weller to a "swarry" of "biled mutton"—C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Smectym'nuus, the title of a celebrated pamphlet containing an attack upon episcopacy (1611). The title is composed of the initial letters of the five writers, SM (Stephen Marshall), EC (Edmund Calamy), TY (Thomas Young), MN (Matthew Newcomen), UUS (William Spurstow). Sometimes one U is omitted. Butler says the business of synods is

To find, in lines of beard and face
The physiognomy of Grace "
And by the sound and twang of no e
If all be sound within disclose
The handkerchief about the neck (Canonical cravat of Smeeck,
From whom the Institution came
When Church and State they set on flame)
Judge rightly if regeneration
Be of the newest cut in fashion.

Hudibras 1. 3 (1663).

Smelfungus Smollett was so called by Sterne, because his volume of Travels through France and Italy is one perpetual snarl from beginning to end.

The lamented Smelfungus travelled from Boulogne to Paris, from Paris to Rome and so on but he set out
"I passed

(1768)

Smell a Voice When a young prince had clandestinely visited the young princess brought up in the palace of the Flower Mountain, the fairy mother Violenta said, "I smell the voice of a man," and commanded the dragon on which she rode to make search for the intruder—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("The White Cat," 1682)

Bottom says, in the part of "Pyramus "

I see a voice, now will I to the chink,
To spy an I can hear my Thisbe's face Shakespeare A Midsummer Night's Dream, act v
sc. 1 (1597)

Smike (1 syl), a poor, half-starved, half-witted boy, the son of Ralph Nickleby. As the marriage was clandestine, the child was put out to nurse, and neither its father nor mother ever went to see it. When about seven years old, the child was stolen by one Brooker, out of revenge, and put to school at Dothoboy's Hall, Yorkshire. Brooker paid the school fees for six years, and being then transported, the payment ceased, and the boy was made a sort of drudge. Nicholas Nickleby took pity on him, and when he left, Smike ran away to join his friend, who took care of the poor half-witted creature till he died (see pp 594-5, original edit)—C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

Smiler, a sheriff's officer, in A Regular Fix, by J M Morton

Smilinda, a -lovelorn maiden, to whom Sharper was untrue. Pope, in his eclogue called The Basset Table (1715), makes Cordelia and Smilinda contend on this knotty point, "Who suffers most, she who loses at basset, or she who loses her lover?" They refer the question to Betty Lovet. Cordelia stakes her "lady's companion, made by Mathers, and worth fifty guineas," on the point, and Smilinda stakes a snuff-box, won at Corticelli's in a raffle, as her pledge. When Cordelia has stated the iron agony of loss at cards, and Smilinda the crushing grief of losing a sweetheart, "strong as a footman and as his master sweet," Lovet awards the lady's companion to Smilinda, and the snuff-box to Cordelia, and bids both give over, "for she wants her tea." Of course, this was suggested by Virgil's Eclogue, iii.

Smith. In the Leisure Hour we read "During a period of seventeen years (from 1838 to 1854, both inclusive), the births, deaths, and marriages of the Smiths registered amounted to 286,037, and it is calculated that the families of Smith in England are not less than 53,000 "

* * This must be a very great miscalculation. 286,037, in seventeen years, gives rather more than 16,825 a year, or a marriage, death, or birth to every three families per annum (nearly). If the registration is correct, the number of families must be ten times the number stated.

Smith (Henry), alias "Henry Gow," alias "Gow Chrom," alias "Hail of the Wynd," the armourer, and lover of Catharine Glover, whom at the end he marries—Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Smith (Mr), a faithful confidential clerk in the bank of Dornton and Sulk, —Holcroft, The Road to Ruin (1792)

Smith (Ramy-Day), John Thomas Smith, antiquary (1766-1838)

Smith (Wayland), an invisible farmer, who haunted the "Vale of White Horse," in Berkshire, where three flat stones supporting a fourth commemorate the place of his stithy His fee was six-pence, and he was offended if more were offered him

Sir W Scott has introduced him in Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Smith's Prizeman, one who has obtained the prize (£25) founded in the University of Cambridge by Robert Smith, D D, once Master of Trinity Two prizes are awarded annually to two commencing bachelors of arts for proficiency in mathematics and natural philosophy

Smollett of the Stage (The), George Farquhar (1678-1707)

Smotherwell (Stephen), the executioner—Sir W Scott, Fair Maid of Perth (time, Henry IV)

Smyr'nean Poet (The), Mimnermos, born at Smyrna (B N C 630)

Snacks, the hard, grudging steward of lord Lackwit, who by grasping got together £26,000 When lord Lackwit died, and the property came to Robin Roughhead, he tondied him with the greatest servility, but Robin dismissed him and gave the post to Frank—Allingham, Fortune's Frolic

Snaggs, a village portrait-taker and tooth-drawer Hesays, "I draw off heads and draws out teeth," or "I takes off heads and takes out teeth" Major Touchwood, having dressed himself up to look like his uncle the colonel, pretends to have the tooth-ache Snaggs, being sent for, prepares to operate on the colonel, and the colonel in a towering rage sends him to the right about—T Dibdin, What Next?

Snags'by (Mr), the law-stationer in Cook's Court, Cursitor Street A very mild specimen of the "spear half," in terrible awe of his termagant wife, whom he calls euphemistically "his little woman" He preceded most of his remarks by the words, "Not to put too fine a point upon it"—C. Dickens, Bleak House (1852)

Snail, the collector of customs, near Ellangowan House—Sir W Scott, Guy Mannering (time, George II)

Snailsfoot (Bryce), the jagger or pedlar—Sir W. Scott, The Pirate (time, William III)

Snake (Mr), a traitorous ally of lady Sneerwell, who has the effrontery to say to her, "You paid me extremely liberally for propagating the lie, but unfortunately I have been offered double to speak the truth" He says

Ah sir consider I live by the baseness of my character and if it were once known that I have been betrayed into an honest action I shall lose every friend I have in the world.—Sheridan School for Scandal v 3 (1777)

Snap, the representation of a dragon which for many years was carried about the city of Norwich on Guild day in grand procession with flags and banners, bands of music, and whiffers with swords to clear the way, all in fancy costume Snap was of great length, a man was in the middle of the beast to carry it, and caused its head to turn and jaws to open an amazing width, that half-pence might be tossed into it and caught in a bag The procession was stopped in the year 1821, when Snap was laid up in St Andrew's Hall

At Metz a similar procession used to take place annually on St Mark's Day, the French Snap being called "St Clement's dragon"

Snare (1 syl), sheriff's officer—Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV. (1598)

Snawley, "in the oil and colour line" A "sleek, flat-nosed man, bearing in his countenance an expression of mortification and sanctity"—C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, iii (1838)

Sneak (Jerry), a hen-pecked pin-maker, a paltry, pitiful, prying sneak If ever he summoned up a little manliness, his wife would begin to cry, and Jerry was instantly softened

Master Sneak the ancient corporation of Garratt in consideration of your great parts and abilities, and out of respect to their landlord sir Jacob have unanimously cho en you major—Act II

Jerry Sneak has become the type of hen pecked husband.—Temple Bar, 40 (1874)

Mrs Sneak, wife of Jerry, a domineering tartar of a woman, who keeps her lord and master well under her thumb She is the daughter of sir Jacob Jollup—S Foote, The Mayor of Garratt (1763)

Jerry Sneak Russell So Samuel Russell the actor was called, because of his inimitable representation of "Jerry Sneak," which was quite a hit (1766-1815)

Sneer, a double-facederitie, who carps at authors behind their backs, but fawns on them when they are present (see act 1) — Sheridan, The Critic (1779)

Sneerwell (Lady), the widow of a City knight Mr Snake says, "Every one allows that lady Sneerwell can do more with a word or a look than many even with the most laboured detail, even when they happen to have a little truth on their side to support it"

Wounded myself in the early part of my life by the envenomed tongue of slander I confess I have since known no pleasure equal to the reducing of others to the level of my own reputation — Sheridan School for Scandal L 1 (1777)

Miss Farren took leave of the stage in 1797 and her concluding words were Let me request Lady Sneerwell that you will make my respects to the candidous college of which you are a member and inform them that lady Tenzle [about to be countess of Derby] licentiate begs leave to return the diploma they granted her as she now leaves off practice and kills characters no longer A burst of applause followed and no more of the play was listened to — Mrs C Mathews.

Sneeze into a Sack (To), to be guillotined

Who kissed La Guillotine looked through the little window and sneezed into the sack. — C Dickens A Tale of Two Cities III. 4 (1859)

Sneezing A person who sneezed was at one time supposed to be under the influence of faeries and demons, and as the name of God repelled all evil spirits, the benediction of "God bless you!" drove away the demon, and counteracted its influence

Judge Haliburton has a good paper "On Sneezing," in Temple Bar, 345 (1870)

But, I have often Dr Skeleton had it in my head to ask some of the faculty what can be the reason that when a man happens to sneeze all the company bow.

Snee. Sneezing Dr Pultruderry was a mortal symptom that attended a pestilential disease which formerly depopulated the republic of Athens ever since when that convulsion occurs a short ejaculation is offered up that the sneezing or sneezing party may not be afflicted with the same distemper

But Upon my conscience a very learned account! Ay and a very civil institution too! — Bickerstaff and Foote Dr Laet in His Charlot (1769)

Snitchey and Craggs, lawyers

It was the opinion of Mr Thomas Craggs that "everything is too easy," especially law, that it is the duty of wise men to make everything as difficult as possible, and as hard to go as rusty locks and hinges which will not turn for want of greasing He was a cold, hard, dry man, dressed in grey-and-white like a flint, with small twinkles in his eyes Jonathan Snitchey was like a magpie or raven He generally finished by saying, "I speak for Self and Craggs," and, after the death of his partner, "for Self and Craggs deceased"

Mrs Snitchey and Mrs Craggs, wives of the two lawyers Mrs Snitchey was, on principle, suspicious of Mr Craggs, and Mrs Craggs was, on principle, suspicious of Mr Snitchey Mrs Craggs would say to her lord and master

Your Snitchey! Indeed! I don't see what you want with your Snitchey for my part. You trust a great deal too much to your Snitchey, I think, and I hope you may never find my words come true.

Mrs Snitchey would observe to Mr Snitchey

Snitchey If ever you were led away by man take my word for it, you are led away by Craggs and if ever I can read a double purpose in mortal eye I can read it in Craggs eye — C Dickens, The Battle of Life II. (1846)

Sodor and Man Sodor is a contraction of Sodorensis The sodor-cys or sodor-cys means "the southern isles" The bishop of Sodor and Man is bishop of Man and the southern isles

Sofronia, a young Christian of Jerusalem, the heroine of an episode in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered (1575) The tale is thus Aladine king of Jerusalem stole from a Christian church an image of the Virgin, being told by a magician that it was a palladium, and, if set up in a mosque, the Virgin would forsake the Christian army, and favour the Mohomedan The image was accordingly set up in a mosque, but during the night was carried off by some one Aladine, greatly enraged, ordered the instant execution of all his Christian subjects, but, to prevent this massacre, Sofronia accused herself of the offence. Her lover Olindo, hearing that Sofronia was sentenced to death, presented himself before the king, and said that he and not Sofronia was the real offender, whereupon the king ordered both to instant execution, but Clorinda the Amazon, pleading for them, obtained their pardon, and Sofronia left the stake to join Olindo at the altar of matrimony —Bk 11

This episode may have been suggested by a well-known incident in ecclesiastical history. At Merum, a city of Phrygia, Amachus the governor of the province ordered the temple to be opened, and the idols to be cleansed. Three Christians, inflamed with Christian zeal, went by night and broke all the images. The governor, unable to discover the culprits, commanded all the Christians of Merum to be put to death, but the three who had been guilty of the act confessed their offence, and were executed —Soerôts, Ecclesiastical History, in 15 (A D 439) (See SOPHRODIA)

Soho (London) The tradition is that this square was so called from the watchword of the duke of Monmouth at the battle of Sedgemoor, in 1685. The reverse of this may possibly be true, viz., that the duke selected the watchword from the name of the locality in which he lived, but the name of the place certainly existed in 1632, if not earlier.

Soi-même St Soi-même, the "natural man," in opposition to the "spiritual man." In almost all religious acts and feelings, a thread of self may be detected, and many things are done ostensibly for God, but in reality for St Soi-même.

They attended the church service not altogether without regard to St. Soi-même. —Asylum Christi II.

Soldan (The), Philip II of Spain, whose wife was Adicia (or papal bigotry). Prince Arthur sent the soldan a challenge for wrongs done to Sament, a female ambassador (deputies of the states of Holland). On receiving this challenge, the soldan "swore and banned most blasphemously," and mounting "his chariot high" (the high ships of the Armada), drawn by horses fed on carrion (the Inquisitors), went forth to meet the prince, whom he tore to pieces with his chariot or trample down beneath his horses' hoofs. Not being able to get at the soldan from the great height of the chariot, the prince uncovered his shield, and held it up to view. Instantly the soldan's horses were so terrified that they fled, regardless of the whip and reins, overthrew the chariot, and left the soldan on the ground, "torn to rags, amongst his own iron hooks and grapples keen" —Spenser, Fairy Queen, v 8 (1596)

* * The overthrow of the soldan by supernatural means, and not by combat, refers to the destruction of the Armada by tempest, according to the legend of the medals, Flavit Jehovah, et dissipati sunt ("He blew with His blast, and they were scattered")

Soldier's Daughter (The), a comedy by A. Cherry (1804). Mrs. Cheerly, the daughter of colonel Woodley, after a marriage of three years, is left a widow, young, rich, gay, and engaging. She comes to London, and Frank Heartall, a generous-minded young merchant, sees her at the opera, falls in love with her, and follows her to her lodging. Here he meets with the Malfort family, reduced to abject poverty by speculation, and relieves them. Ferret, the villain of the piece, spreads a report that Frank gave the money as hush-money, because he had base designs on Mrs. Malfort, but his character is cleared, and he leads to the altar the blooming young widow, while the return of Malfort's father places his son again in prosperous circumstances.

Soldiers' Friend (The), Frederick duke of York, second son of George III, and commander of the British forces in the Low Countries during the French Revolution (1763-1827).

Solemn Doctor (The) Henry Goethals was by the Sorbonne given the honorary title of Doctor Solennis (1227-1293).

Sologne, in France. There is a legend that every domestic animal, such as dogs, cats, pigs, horses, cows, etc., in Sologne, become possessed of human speech from the midnight of Christmas Eve to the midday of December 25

Solomon, an epic poem in three books, by Prior (1718). Bk. i. Solomon seeks happiness from wisdom, but comes to the conclusion that "All is vanity." This book is entitled Knowledge. Bk. ii. Solomon seeks happiness in wealth, grandeur, luxury, and ungodliness, but comes to the conclusion that "All is vanity and vexation of spirit." This book is entitled Pleasure. Bk. iii, entitled Power, consists of the reflections of Solomon upon human life, the power of God, life, death, and a future state. An angel reveals to him the future lot of the Jewish race, and Solomon concludes with this petition

Restore Great Father Thy instructed son
And in my act may Thy great will be done

Solomon is called king of the gnomes and fairies. This is probably a mere blunder. The monarchs of these spirits was called "suleyman," and this title of rank has been mistaken for a proper name.

Solomon died standing. Solomon employed the gnomes in building the Temple, but, perceiving that his end was at hand, prayed God that his death might be concealed from the gnomes till the work was completed. Accordingly, he died standing, leaning on his staff as if in prayer. The gnomes, supposing him to be alive, toiled on, and when the Temple was fully built, a worm gnawed the staff, and the corpse fell prostrate to the earth. Mahomet refers to this as a fact.

When We [God] had decreed that Solomon should die nothing discovered his death unto them [the gnomes] except the creeping thing of the earth which gnawed his staff. And when his [dead] body fell down the gnomes plainly perceived that if they had known that which is secret, they would not have continued in a vile punishment — At Koran xxxiv

Solomon's Favourite Wife. Prior, in his epic poem called Solomon (bk. ii), makes Abri the favourite.

The apples she had gathered melt most sweet
The cake she knead it was the savoury in it
All fruits their odour to it and meats their taste
If gentle Abri had not decked the feast
Dishonoured did the sparkling goblet stand
Unless received from gentle Abri's hand
Nor could my soul approve the music's tone
Till all was hushed and Abri sung alone.

Al Berdawi, Jallalo'ddin, and Ahulfeda, give Aminah, daughter of Jerad, king of Tyre, as his favourite concubine.

Solomon Kills His Horses. Solomon bought thousands of horses, and went to examine them. The examination took him the whole day, so that he omitted the prayers which he ought to have repeated. This neglect came into his mind at sunset, and, by way of atonement, he slew all the horses except a hundred of the best "as an offering to God," and God, to make him amends for his loss, gave him the dominion of the winds. Mahomet refers to this in the following passage —

When the horses standing on three feet and touching the ground with the edge of the fourth foot swift in the course were set in parade before him [Solomon] in the evening he said: Verily I have loved the love of earthly good above the remembrance of my Lord, and I have spent the time in viewing these horses till the sun is hidden by the veil of night. Bring the horses back unto me. And when they were brought back he began to cut off their legs and their necks. — At Koran xxxviii

Solomon's Mode of Travelling. Solomon had a carpet of green silk, on which his throne was placed. This carpet was large enough for all his army to stand on. When his soldiers had stationed themselves on his right hand, and the spirits on his left, Solomon commanded the winds to convey him whither he listed. Whereupon the winds buoyed up the carpet, and transported it to the place the king wished to go to, and while passing thus through the air, the birds of heaven hovered overhead, forming a canopy with their wings to ward off the heat of the sun. Mahomet takes this legend as an historic fact, for he says in reference to it

Unto Solomon We subjected the strong wind, and it ran at his command to the land whereon We had bestowed our blessing. — At Koran xxi

And again

We made the wind subject to him, and it ran gently at his command whithersoever he desired. — At Koran xxxviii

Solomon's Signet-Ring. The rabbins say that Solomon wore a ring in which was set a chased stone that told him everything he wished to know.

Solomon Loses His Signet-Ring. Solomon - favourite concubine was Amna, daughter of Jerada king of Tyre, and when he went to bathe, it was to Amna that he entrusted his signet-ring. One day, the devil Sakhar assumed the likeness of Solomon, and so got possession of the ring, and for forty days reigned in Jerusalem, while Solomon himself was a wanderer living on alms. At the end of the forty days, Sakhar flung the ring into the sea, it was swallowed by a fish, which was given to Solomon. Having thus obtained his ring again, Solomon took Sakhar captive, and cast him into the sea of Galilee — Al Koran (Sale's notes, ch. xxxviii) (See JONATHAN, p. 501)

* * Mahomet, in the Koran, takes this legend as an historic fact, for he says "We [God] also tried Solomon, and placed on his throne a counterfeit body [i.e. Sakhar the devil]" — Ch. xxxviii

Uffan, the sage, saw Solomon asleep, and, wishing to take off his signet-ring, gave three arrows to Aboutaleb, saying, "When the serpent springs upon me and strikes me dead, shoot one of these arrows at me, and I shall instantly come to life again." Uffan tugged at the ring, was stung to death, but, being struck by one of the arrows, revived. This happened twice. After the third attempt, the heavens grew so black, and the thunder was so alarming, that Aboutaleb was afraid to shoot, and, throwing down the bow and arrow, fled with precipitation from the dreadful place — Comte de Caylus, Oriental Tales ("History of Aboutaleb," 1713)

Solomon (The Second), James I of England (1566, 1603-1625)

Solomon, a tedious, consequential old butler, in the service of count Winter-son. He has two idiosyncrasies. One is that he receives letters of confidential importance from all parts of the civilized world, but "has received no communication from abroad to tell him who Mrs Haller is." One letter "from Constantinople" turns out to be from his nephew, Tim Twist the tailor, about a waistcoat which had been turned three times. In regard to the other idiosyncrasy, he boasts of his cellar of wine provided in a "most frugal and provident way," and of his alterations in the park, "all done with the most economical economy." He is very proud of his son Peter, a half-witted lad, and thinks Mrs Haller "casts eyes at him" — Benj Thompson, The Stranger (1797)

Solomon Daisy, parish clerk and bell-ringer of Clugwell. He had little round, black, shiny eyes like beads, wore rusty black breeches, a rusty black coat, and a long-flapped waistcoat with little queer buttons like his eyes. As he sat in the firelight, he seemed all eyes, from head to foot — C Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1811)

Solomon of China (The), Tact-song I, whose real name was Lee-cheemen. He reformed the calendar, founded a very extensive library, established schools in his palace, built places of worship for the Nestorian Christians, and was noted for his wise maxims (*, 618-626)

Son, What! all this for a son? So said William Cecil lord Burghley when queen Elizabeth ordered him to give Edmund Spenser £100 as an expression of her pleasure at some verses he had presented to her When a pension of £50 a year was settled on the poet, lord Burghley did all in his power to oppose the grant To this Spenser alludes in the lines following —

Grief of griefs! O gall of all good hearts!
To see that virtue should be despised be
Of him that first was rail'd on for virtuous part
And now broad-spread like an aged tree
Let none shoot up that nigh him planted be
Oh let the man of whom the Muse is scorned
Alive nor dead be of the Muse adorned!

Sophia (The princess), only child of the old king of Lombardy, in love with Paladore, a Briton, who saved her life by killing a boar which had gored her horse to death. She was unjustly accused of wantonness by duke Birino, whom the king wished her to marry, but whom she rejected. By the law of Lombardy, this offence was punishable by death, but the accuser was bound to support his charge by single combat, if any champion chose to fight in her defence. Paladore challenged the duke, and slew him. The whole villainy of the charge was then exposed, the character of the princess was cleared, and her marriage with Paladore concludes the play — Robert Jephson, The Law of Lombardy (1779)

Sorrows of Werther, a mawkish, sentimental novel by Goethe (1771), once extremely popular "Werther" is Goethe himself, who loves a married woman, and becomes disgusted with life because "[Charlotte] is the wife of his friend Kestner"

Werther infusing it self into the core and who a spirit of literature gave birth to a race of sentimentalists who raced and wallied in every part of the world till better light dawned on them, or at any rate till exhausted nature laid itself to sleep and it was discovered that lamenting was an unproductive labour—Carlyle.

Sosia (in Molière Sosie), the slave of Amphitruon When Mercury assumes the form of Sosia, and Jupiter that of Amphitruon, the mistakes and confusion which arise resemble those of the brothers Antipholus and their servants the brothers Dromio, in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors—Plautus, Molière (1668), and Dryden (1690), Amphitruon

His first name looks out upon him like another Sosia or as if a man should suddenly encounter his own silhouette.—C. Lamb.

SOSII, brothers, the name of two booksellers at Rome, referred to by Horace

Sotenville (Mon le baron de), father of Angélique, and father-in-law of George Dandin His wife was of the house of Prudoterie, and both boasted that in 300 years no one of their distinguished lines ever swerved from virtue "La bravoure n'y est pas plus héréditaire aux mâles, que la chasteté aux familles" They lived with their son-in-law, who was allowed the honour of paying their debts, and receiving a snubbing every time he opened his mouth that he might be taught the mysteries of the haut monde—Molière, George Dandin (1668)

Soulis (Lord William), a man of prodigious strength, cruelty, avarice, and treachery Old Redcap gave him a charmed life, which nothing could affect "all threefold ropes of sand were twisted round his body" Lord Soulis waylaid Mary the lady-love of the heir of Branksholme, and kept her in durance till she promised to become his bride Walter, the brother of the young heir, raised his father's hegemen and invested the castle Lord Soulis having fallen into the hands of the hegemen, "they wrapped him in lead, and flung him into a caldron, till lead, bones, and all were melted"—John Leyden (1802)

(The caldron is still shown in the Skellhill at Ninestine Rig, part of the range of hills which separates Liddesdale and Teviotdale)

South (Squire), the archduke Charles of Austria—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull (1712)

South Britain, all the island of Great Britain except Scotland, which is called "North Britain"

South Sea (The), the Pacific Ocean, so called by Vasco Nuñez de Balboa, in 1513 (See MISSISSIPPI RIVER, p 617)

Southampton (The earl of), the friend of the earl of Essex, and involved with him in the charge of treason, but pardoned—Henry Jones, The Earl of Essex (1715)

Sow (A), a machine of war It was a wooden shed which went on wheels, the roof being ridged like a hog's back Being thrust close to the wall of a place besieged, it served to protect the besieging party from the arrows hurled against them from the walls When the countess of March (called "Black Agnes"), in 1335, saw one of these engines advancing towards her castle, she called out to the earl of Salisbury, who commanded the engineers

Beware Montagow
For farrow shall thy sow and then had such a huge fragment of rock rolled on the engine that it dashed it to pieces When she saw the English soldiers running away, the countess called out, "Lo! lo! the litter of English pigs!"

Sow of Dallweir, named "Hewen" went burrowing through Wales, and leaving in one place a grain of barley, in another a little pig, a few bees, a hen or two of wheat, and so on, and these made the places celebrated for the particular produce ever after

It is supposed that the sow was really a ship, and that the keeper of the sow, named Coll ab Collfrewi, was the captain of the vessel — Welsh Trads, lvi

Sowerberry, the parodical undertaker, to whom Oliver Twist is bound when he quits the workhouse Sowerberry was not a badly disposed man, and he treated Oliver with a certain measure of kindness and consideration, but Oliver was ill-treated by Mrs Sowerberry, and bullied by a big boy called Noah Claypole Being one day greatly exasperated by the bully, Oliver gave him a thorough "drubbing," whereupon Charlotte the maidservant set upon him like a fury, scratched his face, and held him fast till Noah Claypole had pummelled him within an inch of his life Thrice against one was too much for the lad, so he ran away — C Dickens, Oliver Twist (1837)

Sowerberry, a misanthrope — W Brough, A Phenomenon in a Snock Troc'

Sowerbrowst (Mr), the maltster — Sir W Scott, St. Roman's Well (lunc, George III)

Soyer (Alexis), a celebrated cook, appointed, in 1837, chef de cuisine to the Reform Club Alexis Soyer [Soy yea] was the author of several works, as The Gastronomic Regenerator, The Poor Man's Regenerator, The Modern Housewife etc (died 1858)

Spado, an impudent rascal in the band of don Cesar (called "captain Ramirez"), who tries every one, and delights in mischief — O Keefe, Castle of Andalusia (1798)

Quik's great parts were Isaac "Tony Lumpkin" Spado and sir Christopher Curry — Records of a Stage Veteran

("Isaac," in the Duenna, by Sheridan, "Tony Lumpkin," in She Swoops to Conquer, by Goldsmith, "sir Christopher Curry," in Inkle and Yarico, by G Colman)

Spahis, native Algerian cavalry officered by Frenchmen The infantry are called Turcos

Spanish Brutus (The), Alfonso Perez de Guzman, governor of Tarifa in 1293 Here he was besieged by the infant don Juan, who had Guzman's son in his power, and threatened to kill him unless Tarifa was given up Alfonso replied, "Sooner than be guilty of such treason, I will lend Juan a dagger to carry out his threat, ' and so saying, he tossed his dagger over the wall. Juan, unable to appreciate this patriotism, slew the young man without remorse.

* * Lopé de Vega has dramatized this incident.

Spanish Curate (The), Lopez — Beaumont and Fletcher, The Spanish Curate (1622)

Spanish Fryar (The), a drama by Dryden (1680). It contains two plots, wholly independent of each other. The serious element is this: Leonora, the usurping queen of Aragon, is promised in marriage to duke Bertrán, a prince of the blood, but is in love with Torrismond, general of the army, who turns out to be the son and heir of king Sancho, supposed to be dead. Sancho is restored to his throne, and Leonora marries Torrismond. The comic element is the illicit love of colonel Lorenzo for Elvira, the wife of Gomez, a rich old banker. Dominick (the Spanish friar) helps on this scandalous amour, but it turns out that Lorenzo and Elvira are brother and sister.

Spanish Lady (The), a ballad contained in Percy's Poeticals, ii 23. A Spanish lady fell in love with captain Popham, whose prisoner she was. A command being sent to set all the prisoners free, the lady prayed the gallant captain to make her his wife. The Englishman replied that he could not do so, as he was married already. On hearing this, the Spanish lady gave him a chain of gold and a pearl bracelet to take to his wife, and told him that she should retire to a nunnery and spend the rest of her life praying for their happiness.

It will be found up with the ballad of Margaret's Chain (see) and the Spanish Lady against the walls of every castle in the country — Isaac Bickerstaff Love in a Village (1733).

Spanish Main (The), the coast along the north part of South America.

A parvo from the Spanish main. Campbell.

Spanish Tragedy (The), by T. Kyd (1597). Horatio (son of Hieronimo) is murdered while he is sitting in an arbour with Belimperia. Balthazar, the rival of Horatio, commits the murder, assisted by Belimperia's brother Lorenzo. The murderers hang the dead body on a tree in the garden, where Hieronimo roused by the cries of Belimperia, discovers the crime and goes raving mad.

Spanker (Lady Gay), in London Assurance, by D. Boucicault (1841).

Dance and lady Gay Spanker, act themselves and will never be dropped out of the list of dance plays — Perry Fitzgerald.

Sparabell'a, a shepherdess in love with D Urvey, but D Urvey loves Clamf-sills, ' the fairest shepherd wooed the foulest lass.' Sparabell'a resolves to kill herself, but how? Shall she cut her windpipe with a penknife? ' No,' she says, ' squeaking pigs die so.' Shall she suspend herself to a tree? ' No,' she says, ' dogs die in that fashion.' Shall she drown herself in the pool? ' No,' she says, ' scolding queans die so.' And while in doubt how to kill herself, the sun goes down, and

The prudent maiden deemed it then too late
And till to-morrow came deferred her fate.

Gay Pastoral, III (171).

Sparkish, ' the prince of coxcombs,' a fashionable fool and ' a cuckold before marriage.' Sparkish is engaged to Alitha Moody, but introduces to her his friend Harcourt, allows him to make love to her before his face, and, of course, is jilted — The Country Girl (Garriek, altered from Wycherly's Country Wye, 1675).

William Mountford (1691-1692) flourished in days when the ranting tragedies of N. Lee and the juggling plays of Dryden fed princes on of the stage. His most important characters were ' Alexander the Great' (By Lee), and ' Castilio' in the Orphan (by Otway). Cibber highly commends his ' English' — Denton Cook.

Sparkler (Edmund), son of Mrs Merdle by her first husband. He married Fanny, sister of Little Dorrit. Edmund Sparkler was a very large man, called in his own regiment, ' Quinbus Flestrin, junior, or the Young Man-Mountain.'

Mrs Sparkler, Edmund's wife. She was very pretty, very self-willed, and snubbed her husband in most approved fashion — C. Dickens, Little Dorrit (1857).

Sparsit (Mrs), housekeeper to Jorials Bounderby, brinker and mill-owner at Coketown. Mrs Sparsit is a ' highly connected lady,' being the great-niece of lady Scadgers. She had a ' Cornelian nose, and dense black eyebrows,' was much believed in by her master, who, when he married, made her ' keeper of the bank.' Mrs Sparsit, in collusion with the light porter Bitzer, then acted the spy on Mr Bounderby and his young wife — C. Dickens, Hard Times (1854).

Spartan Broth, sorry fare.

The promoters would be rejoiced to dine on Spartan broth in Leicester Square — Daily News February 22, 1879.

Spartan Dog (A), a bloodhound.

O Spartan dog
Mourn thou anguished hanger of the sea
Phryne's O'Connell actor in 1851.

Spartan Mother (The) said to her son going to battle, as she handed him his shield, "My son, return with this or on it," i.e. come back with it as a conqueror or be brought back on it as one slain in fight, but by no means be a fugitive or suffer the enemy to be the victorious party—

Why should I not play
The Spartan mother?

Tennyson, The Princess II.

Spasmodic School (The), certain authors of the nineteenth century, whose writings abound in spasmodic phrases, startling expressions, and words used out of their common acceptation. Carlyle, noted for his Germanic English, is the chief of this school. Others are Bailey, author of Festus, Sydney Dobell, Gillfillan, Tennyson, and Alexander Smith.

* * Professor Ayton has gibbeted this class of writers in his Firmilian, a Spasmodic Tragedy (1854).

Spear When a king of the ancient Caledonians abdicated, he gave his spear to his successor, and "raised a stone on high" as a record to future generations. Beneath the stone he placed a sword in the earth and "one bright boss from his shield."

When thou O stone shall moulder down and lose thee in the moss of years, then shall the traveller come, and whistling pass away. Here Fingal resigned his spear after the last of his fields.—Ossian Temora viii.

Spear (The Forward), a sign of hostility. In the Ossianic times, when a stranger landed on a coast, if he held the point of his spear forwards, it indicated hostile intentions, but if he held the point behind him, it was a token that he came as a friend.

Are his heroes many? said Calibar and lifts he the spear of battle or comes the king in peace? In peace he comes not, king of Erin. I have seen his forward spear.—Ossian Temora I.

Spear of Achilles Telphos, son-in-law of Priam, opposed the Greeks in their voyage to Troy. A severe contest ensued, and Achilles with his spear wounded the Mysian king severely. He was told by an oracle that the wound could be cured only by the instrument which gave it, so he sent to Achilles to effect his cure. The surly Greek replied he was no physician, and would have dismissed the messengers with scant courtesy, but Ulysses whispered in his ear that the aid of Telphos was required to direct them on their way to Troy. Achilles now scraped some rust from his spear, which being applied to the wound, healed it. This so conciliated Telphos that he conducted the fleet to Troy, and even took part in the war against his father-in-law.

Achilles' and his father's javelin caused
Pain first and then the boon of health restored.
Dante Hell xxxi. (1369).

And other folk have wondered on Achilles' spear.

For he couthe with it bothe heale and dere.
Chaucer Canterbury Tales (The Squire's Tale 1.25).

Whose smile and frown like to Achilles' spear
Is able with the change to kill and cure
Shakespeare 2 Henry VI act v. sc. 1 (1531)

* * * Probably Telphos was cured by the plant called Achilles (milfoil or yarrow), still used in medicine as a tonic. "The leaves were at one time much used for healing wounds, and are still employed for this purpose in Scotland, Germany, France, and other countries." Achilles (the man) made the wound, achilles (the plant) healed it.

Spears of Spyinghow (The Thrice), in the troop of Fitzurse—Sir W. Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.)

Speech ascribed to Dumb Animals Al Borak, the animal which conveyed Mahomet to the seventh heaven (p. 17), Arion, the wonderful horse which Heracles gave to Adrastus (p. 51), Baalam's ass (Dumb xxii 28-30), the black pigeons of Dodona (p. 259, art. Dodona), Comrade, Fortnino's horse (p. 206), Katmir, the dog of the Seven Sleepers (p. 506), Saleh's camel (p. 863), Temilia, king of the serpents (p. 981), Xanthos, the horse of Achilles. Frithjof's ship, Ellida, could not speak, but it understood what was said to it (p. 905).

Speech given to Conceal Thought. La parole a été donnée à l'homme pour déguiser la pensée or pour l'aider à cacher sa pensée. Talleyrand is usually credited with this sentence, but captain Gronow, in his Recollections and Anecdotes, asserts that the words were those of count Montrond, a wit and poet, called "the most agreeable scoundrel and most pleasant reprobate in the court of Marie Antoinette."

Voltaire, in Le Chapon et la Poularde, says "Ils n'emploient les paroles que pour déguiser leurs pensées."

Goldsmith, in The Bee, iii (October 20, 1759), has borrowed the same thought. "The true use of speech is not so much to express our wants as to conceal them."

Speech-Makers (Bad)

ADDISON could not make a speech. He attempted once in the House of Commons, and said, "Mr. Speaker, I conceive—I conceive, sir—sir, I conceive—" Whereupon a member exclaimed, "The right honourable secretary of state has conceived thrice, and brought forth nothing."

CAMPBELL (Thomas) once tried to make a speech, but so stuttered and stammered that the whole table was convulsed with laughter.

CICERO, the great orator, never got over his nervous terror till he warmed to his subject.

IRVING (Washington), even with a speech written out and laid before him, could not deliver it without a breakdown. In fact, he could hardly utter a word in public without trembling.

MOORE (Thomas) could never make a speech.

(Dickens and prince Albert always spoke well and fluently.)

Speed, an inveterate punster and the clownish servant of Valentine one of the two "gentlemen of Verona"—Shakespeare, The Two Gentlemen of Verona (1591).

Speed the Parting Guest

Welcome tho coming speed the parting guest.
Pope Homer's Odyssey (l-5)

Speed the Plough, a comedy by Thomas Morton (1798). Farmer Ashfield brings up a boy named Henry, greatly beloved by every one. This Henry is in reality the son of "Morrington," younger brother of sir Philip Blandford. The two brothers fixed their love on the same lady, but the younger married her, whereupon sir Philip stabbed him to the heart and fully thought him to be dead, but after twenty years the wounded man re-appeared and claimed his son. Henry marries his cousin Emma Blandford, and the farmer's daughter, Susan, marries Robert only son of sir Abel Handy.

Spenlow (Mr), father of Dora (qv). He was a proctor, to whom David Copperfield was articled. Mr Spenlow was killed in a carriage accident.

Misses Lavinia and Clarissa Spenlow, two spinster aunts of Dora Spenlow, with whom she lived at the death of her father.

They were not unlike birds altogether having a sharp brisk sudden manner and a little short spry way of adjusting themselves, like canaries.—C Dickens, David Copperfield xii, (1849).

Spens (Sir Patrick), a Scotch hero, sent in the winter-time on a mission to Norway. His ship, in its home passage, was wrecked against the Papa Stronsay, and every one on board was lost. The incident has furnished the subject of a famous old Scotch ballad.

Spenser The Spensers of English Prose Writers, Jeremy Taylor (1613-1667),

Spenser From Spenser to Fleckno, that is, from the top to the bottom of all poetry, from the sublime to the ridiculous—Dryden, Comment on Spenser, etc

Spenser's Monument, in Westminster Abbey, was erected by Anne Clifford countess of Dorset.

Spider Cure for Fever (A)

Only beware of the fever, my friend, for it is not cured by the mulchell.

Longfellow Frangeline ii. 3 (1842)

Spiders (Unlucky to kill). This especially refers to those small spiders called "money-spinners," which prognosticate good luck. Probably because they appear in greater numbers on a fine morning, although some say the fine day is the precursor of rain.

Spynners ben token of drynacion and of knowing what wetter shal fal for oft by weders that shal fal some spin and were higher and lower and multitude of spynners ever betoken moche regne.—Berthelet. De l'roprietatis Verum xviii 314 (1536).

Spiders Indicators of Gold. In the sixteenth century it was generally said that "Spiders be true signs of great stores of gold," and the proverb arose thus. While a passageto Cathay was being sought by the north-west, a man brought home a stone, which was pronounced to be gold, and caused such a ferment that several vessels were fitted out for the express purpose of collecting gold. Froisher, in 1577, found, in one of the islands on which he landed, similar stones, and an enormous number of spiders.

Spider's Net (A). When Mahomet fled from Mecca, he hid in a cave, and a spider wove its net over the entrance. When the Koreishites came thither, they passed on, being fully persuaded that no one had entered the cave, because the cobweb was not broken.

In the Talmud, we are told that David, in his flight, hid himself in the cave of Adullam, and a spider spun its net over the opening. When Saul came up and saw the cobweb, he passed on, under the same persuasion.

Spidireen (The). If a sailor is asked to what ship he belongs, and does not choose to tell, he says, "The spidireen frigate with nine decks."

Officers who do not choose to tell their quarters, give B K S as their address, i.e. Barnack.

Spindle (Jack), the son of a man of fortune. Having wasted his money in riotous living, he went to a friend to borrow row £100 "Let me see, you want £100, Mr Spindle, let me see, would not £50 do for the present?" "Well," said Jack, "if you have not £100, I must be contented with £50" "Dear me, Mr Spindle!" said the friend, "I find I have but £20 about me" "Never mind," said Jack, "I must borrow the other £30 of some other friend" "Just so, Mr Spindle, just so By-the-by, would it not be far better to borrow the whole of that friend, and then one note of hand will serve for the whole sum? Good morning, Mr Spindle, delighted to see you! Tom, see the gentleman down"—Goldsmith, The Bee, iii (1759)

Spirit of the Cape (The), Adamastor, a hideous phantom, of unearthly pallor, "erect his hair uprose of withered red," his lips were black, his teeth blue and disjointed, his beard haggard, his face scarred by lightning, his eyes "shot livid fire," his voice roared. The sailors trembled at the sight of him, and the fiend demanded how they dared to trespass "where never hero braved his rage before?" He then told them "that every year the shipwrecked should be made to deplore their foolhardiness" According to Barreto, the "Spirit of the Cape," was one of the giants who stormed heaven—Camões, The Lusiad (1572)

In me the Spirit of the Cape behold
That rock by you the Cape of Tempests named
With wide-stretched piles I guard
Great Adamastor is my dreaded name

Canto v

Spirit of the Mountain (The), that peculiar melancholy sound which preceded a heavy storm, very observable in hilly and mountainous countries

The wind was abroad in the oaks The Spirit of the Mountain roared The blast came rustling through the hall—Osian Bar Thula.

Spir'ito, the Holy Ghost as the friend of man, personified in canto ix of The Purp' Island, by Phineas Fletcher (1633) He was married to Urania, and their offspring are Knowledge, Contemplation, Care, Humility, Obedience, Faith or Fido, Penitence, Elpinus or Hope, and Love the foster-son of Gratitude (Latin, spiritus, "spirit")

Spitfire (Will) or WILL SPITFIRE, serving-boy of Roger Wildrake the dissipated royalist—Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Spittle Cure for Blindness Spittle was once deemed a sovereign remedy for ophthalmia—Pliny, Natural History, xxxiii 7

* * The blind man restored to sight by Vespasian was cured by anointing his eyes with spittle—Tacitus, History, iv 81, Suetonius, Vespasian, vii

When [Jesus] had thus spoken He spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle, and He anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay—John ix. 6.

He cometh to Bethsaida and they bring a blind man unto Him and He took the blind man by the hand and when He had spit on his eyes He asked him if he saw ought—Mark viii 2, 23.

Spontaneous Combustion There are above thirty cases on record of death by spontaneous combustion, the most famous being that of the countess Cornelia di Baudi Cesenati, which was most minutely investigated, in 1731, by Giuseppe Bianchini, a prebendary of Verona

The next most noted instance occurred at Rheims, in 1725, and is authenticated by no less an authority than Mon Le Cit, the celebrated physician

Messrs Fodéré and Mere investigated the subject of spontaneous combustion, and gave it as their fixed opinion that instances of death from such a cause cannot be doubted

In vol vi of the Philosophical Transactions, and in the English Medical Jurisprudence, the subject is carefully investigated, and several examples are cited in confirmation of the fact

Joseph Battaglia, a surgeon of Ponte Bosio, gives in detail the case of don G Maria Bertholi, a priest of mount Valerius While reading his breviary, the body of this priest burst into flames in several parts, as the arms, back, and head The sleeves of his shirt, a handkerchief, and his skull-cap were all more or less consumed He survived the injury four days (This seems to me more like an electrical attack than an instance of spontaneous combustion)

Spontoon, the old confidential servant of colonel Talbot—Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Spoon One needs a long spoon to eat with the devil—Old Proverb

Therefore behoveth him a ful long spon

That shall ete with a fend

Chaucer Canterbury Tales 10 016 (Squire's Tale "1355)

Spoons (Gossip) It was customary at one time for sponsors at christenings to give gilt spoons as an offering to their godchild These spoons had on the handle the figure of one of the apostles or evangelists, and hence were called "Apostle spoons" The wealthy would give the twelve apostles, those of less opulence the four evangelists, and others again a single spoon. When Henry

VIII asks Cranmer to be godfather to "a fair young maid," Cranmer replies, "How may I deserve such honour, that am a poor and humble subject?" The king rejoins, "Come, come, my lord, you'd spare your spoons"—Shakespeare, Henry VIII act v sc 2 (1601)

Sporus Under this name, Pope satirized lord John Hervey, generally called "lord Fanny," from his effeminate habits and appearance. He was "half wit, half fool, half man, half beau" lord John Hervey was vice-chamberlain in 1736, and lord privy seal in 1740

That thing of silk
Sporus, it at mere white curd of asses milk
Sature or else alas! can Sporus feed
Who breeds a butterfly upon a wheel?

A Pope Prologue to the Satires (1734)

* * This lord John Hervey married the beautiful Molly Lapel, hence Pope

h15

So perfect a beau and a belle
As when Hervey the handsome was wedded
To the beautiful Molly Lapel.

Sprat Day, November 9, the first day of sprat-selling in the streets. The season lasts about ten weeks

Sprenger (Louis), Annette Veilchen's bachelorette—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Sprightly (Miss Kitty), the ward of Sir Gilbert Pumpkin of Strawberry Hall. Miss Kitty is a great heiress, but stage-struck, and when captain Charles Stanley is introduced, she falls in love with him, first as a "play actor," and then in reality.—I Jackman, All the World's a Stage

Spring (A Sacred) The ancient Sabinians, in times of great national danger, vowed to the gods "a sacred spring" (ter sacrum), if they would remove the danger. That is, all the children born during the next spring were "held sacred," and at the age of 20 were compelled to leave their country and seek for themselves a new home

Spring (See SPRINGS)

Spring-Heel Jack. The marquis of Waterford, in the early parts of the nineteenth century, used to amuse himself by springing on travellers unawares, to terrify them, and from time to time others have followed his silly example. Even so late as 1877-8, an officer in her majesty's service caused much excitement in the garrisons stationed at Aldershot, Colchester, and elsewhere, by his "spring-heel" pranks. In Chichester and its neighbourhood the tales told of this adventurer caused quite a little panic, and many nervous people were afraid to venture out after sunset, for fear of being "sprung" upon. I myself investigated some of the cases reported to me, but found them for the most part taken from ghost tales

Springer (The) Ludwig Margrave of Thuringia was so called, because he escaped from Gieichenstein, in the eleventh century, by leaping over the river Saale

Sprinklers (Holy Water), Danish clubs, with spiked balls fastened to chains

Spruce, M.C. (Captain), in Lend Me Five Shillings, by J M Morton (1764-1838)

Spruch-Sprecher (The) or "sayer of sayings" to the archduke of Austria.—Sir W Scott, The Talisman (time, Richard I)

Spuma'dor, prince Arthur's horse. So called from the form of its mouth which indicated its fiery temper.—Spenser, Fairy Queen, ii (1590)

* * In the Macinogun, his favourite mare is called Llamrei ("the curveter")

Spurs (The Battle of), the battle of Guinnegate, in 1513, between Henry VIII and the duc de Longueville. So called because the French used their spurs in flight more than their swords in flight. (See SPURS OF GOLD, etc)

Spurs (To dish up the), to give one's guests a hint to go, to maunder on when the orator has nothing of importance to say. During the time of the border feuds, when a great family had come to an end of their provisions, the lady of the house sent to table a dish of spurs, as a hint that the guests must spur their horses on for fresh raids before they could be feasted again

When the last bullock was killed and devoured it was the lady's custom to place on the table a dish which on being uncovered was found to contain a pair of clean spurs—a hint to the riders that they must shift for their next meal.—Lord of Misrule, (new edit.) I 211 note.

Spurs of Gold (Battle of the), the battle of Courtray, the most memorable in Flemish history (July 11, 1302). Here the French were utterly routed, and 700 gold spurs were hung as trophies in the church of Notre Dame de Courtray. It is called in French Journée des Éperons d'Or (See SPURS, THE BATTLE OF).

Marching homeward from the bloody battle of the Spurs of Gold.

Longfellow The Belfry of Bruges

Squab (The Poet) Dryden was so called by lord Rochester (1681-1701)

Squab Pie, a pie made of mutton, apples, and onions

Cornwall squab pie, and Devon white pot brings,
And Leicester beans and bacon fit for kings.

King Art of Cookery

Squab Pie, a pie made of squabs, that is young pigeons

Square (Mr), a "philosopher," in Fielding's novel called The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1749)

Squeers (Mr Wackford), of Dotheboys Hall, Yorkshire, a vulgar, conceited, ignorant schoolmaster, overbearing, grasping, and mean. He steals the boys' pocket money, clothes his son in their best suits, half starves them, and teaches them next to nothing. Ultimately, he is transported for perjury on a deed.

Mrs Squeers, wife of Mr Wackford, a raw-boned, harsh, heartless virago, without one spark of womanly feeling for the boys put under her charge.

Miss Fanny Squeers, daughter of the schoolmaster, "not tall like her mother, but short like her father. From the former she inherited a voice of hoarse quality, and from the latter a remarkable expression of the right eye." Miss Fanny falls in love with Nicholas Nickleby, but hates him and spites him because he is insensible of the soft impeachment.

Master Wackford Squeers, son of the schoolmaster, a spoiled boy, who was dressed in the best clothes of the scholars. He was overbearing, self-willed, and passionate.—C Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby (1838)

The person who suggested the character of Squeers was a Mr Shaw of Bowes. He married a Miss Ludman. The satire ruined the school, and was the death both of Mr and Mrs. Shaw.—Notes and Queries October 25 1873.

Squeeze (Miss), a pawnbroker's daughter. Her father had early taught her that money is the "one thing needful," and at death left her a moderate competence. She was so fully convinced of the value of money that she would never part with a farthing without an equivalent, and refused several offers, because she felt persuaded her suitors sought her money and not herself. Now she is old and ill-natured, marked with the small-pox, and neglected by every one.—Goldsmith, A Citizen of the World, XXVIII (1759)

Squint (Lauryer), the great politician of society. He makes speeches for members of parliament, writes addresses, gives the history of every new play, and finds "seasonable thought" upon every possible subject.—Goldsmith, A Citizen of the World, XXIX (1759)

Squint-Eyed, [Guercino] Gian-Francesco Barbieri, the painter (1590-1666)

Squantum (D-) George Whitefield is so called by Foote in his farce entitled The Minor (1714-1770)

Squantum (Dr) The Rev Edward Irving, who had an obliquity of the eyes, was so called by Theodore Hook (1792-1834)

Squire of Dames (The), a young knight, in love with Colymbell, who appointed him a year's service before she would consent to become his bride. The "squire" was to travel for twelve months, to rescue distressed ladies, and bring pledges of his exploits to Colymbell. At the end of the year he placed 300 pledges in her hands, but instead of rewarding him by becoming his bride, she set him another task, viz, to travel about the world on foot, and not present himself again till he could bring her pledges from 300 damsels that they would live in chastity all their life. The squire told Colymbell that in three years he had found only three persons who would take the pledge, and only one of these, he said (a rustic cottager), took it from a "principle of virtue," the other two (a nun and a courtesan) promised to do so, but did not voluntarily join the "virgin martyrs." This "Squire of Dames" turned out to be Britomart—Spenser, Fairy Queen, III 7 (1590)

* * This story is imitated from "The Host's Tale," in Orlando Furioso, XXVIII

Squirt, the apothecary's boy, in Garth's Dispensary, hence any apprentice lad or errand boy

(Pope wrote The Rape of the Lock, 1712)

Squod (Phil), a grotesque little fellow, faithfully attached to Mr George the son of Mrs Rouncewell (housekeeper at Chesney Wold) George had rescued the little street arab from the gutter, and the boy lived at George's "Shooting Gallery" in Leicester Square (London) Phil was remarkable for limping along sideways, as if "tackling"—C Dickens, Blind House (1852)

S S, sourcenance, forget-me-not, in remembrance, a sourcœur

On the Wednesday preceding Easter Day 1463 Sir Anthony was speaking to his royal sister on his knees all the ladies of the court gathered round him, and bound to his left knee a band of gold adorned with stones fashioned into the letters S S (sourcenance or remem-brance), and to this band was suspended an enamelled forget-me-not.—Lord Lytton Last of the Barons 175 (1859)

S S G G, the letters of the Femerichte They stand for Stool, Stain, Grass, Grain ("Stiel," "Stone," "Grass," "Groan") What was meant by these four words is not known

Stael (Madame de), called by Heine [Hil-ne] "a whirlwind in petticoats," and a "sultana of mind"

Stag (The) symbolizes Christ, because (according to fable) it drives serpents by its breath out of their holes, and then tramples them to death—Pliny, Natural History, viii 50

Stag or Hind, emblem of the tribe of Naphtali In the old church at Totness is a stone pulpit divided into compartments, containing shields bearing the emblems of the Jewish tribes, this being one

Naphtali is a blind let loose—Gen. xlix. 21

Stag's Horn, considered in Spain a safeguard against the evil eye, hence, a small horn, silver-tipped, is often hung on the neck of a child If an evil eye is then cast on the child, it enters the horn, which it bursts asunder

Are you not afraid of the evil eye?
Have you a stag's horn with you?

Longfellow The Spanish Student iii. 5

Stagg (Benjamin), the proprietor of the cellar in the Barbican where the secret society of "Prentice Knights" used to convene He was a blind man, who fawned on Mr Sam Tappertit, "the 'prentices' glory" and captain of the "Prentice Knights" But there was a disparity between his words and sentiments, if we may judge from this specimen "Good night, most noble captain! farewell, brave general! bye-bye, illustrious commander!—a conceited, bragging, empty-headed, duck-legged idiot!" Benjamin Stagg was shot by the soldiery in the Gordon riots—C Dickens, Barnaby Rudge (1811)

Stagirite (3 syl) Aristotle is called the Stagirite because he was born at Stagira, in Macedon Almost all our English poets call the word Stagirite as Pope, Thomson, Swift, Byron, Wordsworth, B Browning, etc., but it should be Stagirite (Σταγίριος)

Thick like a glory round the Stagirite
Your rivals throng the edges.

L. Browning Paracelsus I

Standard A substantial building for water supplies, as the Water Standard of Cornhill, the Standard in Cheap, opposite Honey Lane, "which John Wells, grocer, caused to be made [re-built] in his mayoralty, 1430"—Stow, Survey ("Cheapside")

The Cheapside Standard This Standard was in existence in the reign of Edward I In the reign of Edward III two fishmongers were beheaded at the Cheapside Standard, for aiding in a riot Henry IV caused "the blank charter of Richard II" to be burnt at this place

The Standard, Cornhill This was a conduit with four spouts, made by Peter Morris, a German, in 1582, and supplied with Thames water, conveyed by leaden pipes over the steeple of St Magnus's Church It stood at the east end of Cornhill, at its junction with Gracechurch Street, Bishopsgate Street, and Leadenhall Street The water ceased to run between 1598 and 1603, but the Standard itself remained long after

Distances from London were measured from this spot

London
the spot on which the Standard used to be in house of public entertainment called the Maypole—Dickens, Barnaby Rudge 1 (1841)

Standard (The Battle of the), the battle of Luton Moor, near Northallerton, between the English and the Scotch, in 1138. So called from the "standard," which was raised on a waggon, and placed in the centre of the English army. The pole displayed the standards of St Cuthbert of Durham, St Peter of York, St John of Beverley, and St Wilfred of Ripon, surmounted by a little silver easel containing a consecrated wafer—Hailes, Annals of Scotland, 1 85 (1779)

The Battle of the Standard was so called from the banner of St Cuthbert which was thought always to secure success. It came forth at the battle of Neville's Cross and was again victorious. It was preserved with great reverence till the Reformation when in 1549 Catherine Wittingham (a French lady) wife of the dean of Durham burnt it out of zeal against popery—Miss Yonge Cambridge of English History 1 6-8 (1893)

Standing (To die) Vespasian said, "An emperor of Rome ought to die standing." Louis XVIII of France said, "A king of France ought to die standing." This craze is not confined to crowned heads (See SOLOMON, p 929)

Standish (Miles), the puritan captain, was short of stature, strongly built, broad in the shoulders, deep-chested, and with sinews like iron. His daughter Rose was the first to die "of all who came in the Mayflower." Being desirous to marry Priscilla "the beautiful puritan," he sent young Alden to plead his cause, but the maiden answered archly, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" Soon after this, Standish was shot with a poisoned arrow, and John Alden did speak for himself, and prevailed—Longfellow, Courtship of Miles Standish (1858)

Standish (Mr Justice), a brother magistrate with Bailie Trumbull—Sir W Scott, Rob Roy (time, George I)

Stanley, in the earl of Sussex's train.—Sir W Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Stanley (Captain Charles), introduced by his friend captain Stakely to the family at Strawberry Hall. Here he meets Miss Kitty Sprightly an heiress, who has a theatrical twist. The captain makes love to her under the mask of acting, induces her to run off with him and get married, then, returning to the hall, introduces her as his wife. All the family fancy he is only "acting," but discover too late that their "play" is a life-long reality—I Jackman, All the World's a Stage

Stanley Crest (The) On a chapman gu an eagle feeding on an infant in its nest. The legend is that sir Thomas de Lathom, having no male issue, was walking with his wife one day, and heard the cries of an infant in an eagle's nest. They looked on the child as a gift from God, and adopted it, and it became the founder of the Stanley race (time, Edward III)

Staples (Lawrence), head jailer at Kenilworth Castle—Sir W Scott, Kenilworth (time, Elizabeth)

Star Falling Any wish formed during the shoot of a star will come to pass

Star of Arcady (The), the Great Bear, so called from Calisto, daughter of Ixion king of Arcadia. The little Bear is called the Tyrian Cynosure, from Arcas or Cynosura son of Calisto

And thou shalt be our star of Arcady
Or Tyrian Cynosure (3 syl)
Milton Comus 31. (1634)

 Of course, "Cynosure" signifies "dog's tail," Greek, κυνος ουρα, meaning the star in Ursa Minor

Star of South Africa, a diamond discovered in the South African fields. It weighed in the rough 83½ carats, and after being cut 46½ carats

Star of the South (The), the second largest cut diamond in the world. It weighs 251 carats. It was discovered in Brazil by a poor negress (1853)

Starch (Dr), the tutor of Blushing-ton—W T Moncreiff, The Bashful Man

Starchaterus, of Sweden, a giant in stature and strength, whose life was protracted to thrice the ordinary term. When he felt himself growing old, he hung a bag of gold round his neck, and told Olo he might take the bag of gold if he would cut off his head, and he did so. He hated luxury in every form, and said a man was a fool who went and dined out for the sake of better fare. One day, Helgo king of Norway asked him to be his champion in a contest which was to be decided by himself alone against nine adversaries. Starchaterus selected for the site of combat the top of a mountain covered with snow, and, throwing off his clothes, waited for the nine adversaries. When asked if he would fight with them one by one or all together, he replied, "When dogs bark at me, I drive them all off at once"—Joannes Magnus, Gothorum Suetorumque Historia (1554).

Stareleigh (Justice), a stout, pudgy little judge, very deaf and very irascible, who, in the absence of the chief justice, sat in judgment on the trial of "Bardell v Pickwick"—C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

Starno, king of Loehlin. Having been conquered by Fingal and generously set at liberty, he promised Fingal his daughter Agandecca in marriage, but meant to deal treacherously by him and kill him. Fingal accepted the invitation of Starno, and spent three days in boar-hunts. He was then warned by Agandecca to beware of her father, who had set an ambush to waylay him. Fingal, being forewarned, fell on the ambush and slew every man. When Starno heard thereof, he slew his daughter, whereupon Fingal and his followers took to arms, and Starno either "fled or died." Swarn succeeded his father Starno—Ossian, Fingal, iii, see also Cath-Loda

Starvation Dundas, Henry Dundas the first lord Melville. So called because he introduced the word starvation into the language (1775)

Starveling (Robin), the tailor. He was cast for the part of "Thisbe's mother," in the drama played before duke Thesens (2 syl) on "his wedding day at night." Starveling has nothing to say in the drama—Shakespeare, Midsummer Night's Dream (1592)

State, a royal chair with a canopy over it

Our hostess keeps her state.
Shakespeare Macbeth act III sc. 4 (1606)

Statira, the heroine of La Calprenède's romance of Cassandra. Statira is the daughter of Darius, and is represented as the "most perfect of the works of creation." Oroondates is in love with her, and ultimately marries her

Statira, daughter of Darius, and wife of Alexander Young, beautiful, womanly, of strong affection, noble bearing, mild yet haughty, yielding yet brave. Her love for Alexander was unbounded. When her royal husband took Roxana into favour, the proud spirit of the princess was indignant, but Alexander, by his love, won her back again. Statira was murdered by Roxana the Bactrian, called the "Rival Queen"—N Lee, Alexander the Great (1678)

Miss Boutwell was the original Statira of Lee's Alexander and once when playing with Mrs Barry [1678] he was in danger of receiving on the stage her death blow. It happened thus. Before the curtain drew up the two queens Statira and Roxana had a real rivalry about a lace veil allotted to Miss Boutwell by the manager. This so enraged Mrs Barry that, in stabbing Statira she actually thrust her dagger through her rival's stays, a quarter of an inch or more into the flesh—Campbell Life of Mrs Siddons

Dr Doran tells us that

The charming George Ann Bellamy [1733-1788] procured from Paris two gorgeous dresses for the part of Statira. When leg Wolington who played Roxana "saw them she was so overcome by malice hatred and all uncharitable ableness, that she rolled her rival in the dust pummelled her with the handle of her dagger and screamed in anger

Nor he nor heaven shall shield thee from my justice.
Die sorceress die! and all my wrongs die with thee!
Table Traits

Staunton (The Rev Mr), rector of Willingham, and father of George Staunton

George Staunton, son of the Rev Mr Staunton. He appears first as "Geordie Robertson," a felon, and in the Porteous mob he assumes the guise of "Madge Wildfire." George Staunton is the seducer of Effie Deans. Ultimately he comes to the title of baronet, marries Effie, and is shot by a gypsy boy called "The Whistler," who proves to be his own natural son

Lady Staunton, Effie Deans after her marriage with sir George. On the death of her husband, she retires to a convent on the Continent—Sir W Scott, Heart of Midlothian (time, George II)

Steel Castle, a strong ward, belonging to the Yellow Dwarf. Here he confined All-Fair when she refused to marry him according to her promise—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("The Yellow Dwarf," 1682)

Steele Glas (The), a mirror in which we may "see ourselves as others see us," or see others in their true likenesses

The Christel Glasse, on the other hand, reflects us as vanity dictates, and shows other people as fame paints them. These mirrors were made by Luey'lus (an old artist)

Luey'lus bequeathed "The Christel Glasso"
To such as love to seme but not to be
But unto those that love to see themselves
How foul or fyre soever that they are
He can bequeath a Glasso of trustle Steel.
G Gascoigne The Steele Glas (died 1577)

Steenie, i.e. "Stephen" So George Villiers duke of Buckingham was called by James I, because, like Stephen the first martyr, "all that sat in the council, looking stedfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel" (Acts vi 15)

Stenson (Willie) or "Wandering Willie," the blind fiddler

Steenie Stenson, the piper, in Wandering Willie's tale

Maggie Stenson, or "Epps Anshie," the wife of Wandering Willie—Sir W Scott, Redgauntlet (time, George III)

Steerforth, the young man who led little Em'ly astray. When tired of his toy, he proposed to her to marry his valet Steerforth being shipwrecked off the coast of Yarmouth, Ian Peggotty tried to rescue him, but both were drowned—C Dickens, David Copperfield (1849)

Stein There is a German saying that, "Krems and Stein are three places." The solution lies in the word "and" (German, und). Now Und is between Krems and Stein, so that Krems, Und, [and] Stein are three places

Steinbach (Erwin von) designed Strasbourg Cathedral, begun 1015, and finished 1439

Steinfeldt (The old baroness of) introduced in Donnerhugel's narrative—Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Steinfort (The baron), brother of the countess Wintersen. He falls in love with Mrs Haller, but, being informed of the relationship between Mrs Haller and "the stranger," exerts himself to bring about a reconciliation—Benj Thompson, The Stranger (1797)

Stella The lady Penelope Devereux, the object of sir Philip Sidney's affection married lord Rich, and was a widow Sidney's life-time. Spenser says, in his Astrophel, when Astrophel (sir Philip) died, Stella died of grief, and the two "lovers" were converted into one flower, called "Starlight," which is first red, and as it fades turns blue. Some call it penthea, but henceforth (he says) it shall be called "Astrophel." It is a pure fiction that Stella died from grief at the death of Sidney, for she afterwards married Charles Blount, created by James I earl of Devonshire. The poet himself must have forgotten his own lines

No less praiseworthy Stella do I read
The more hit my praises of her needed are,
Whom verse of noblest shepherd lately dead [1606]
Hath praised and raised above each other star
Spenser Colin Cloute's Come Home Again (1591)

Stella Miss Hester Johnson was so called by Swift, to whom she was privately married in 1706. Hester is first perverted into the Greek aster, and "aster" in Latin, like stella, means "a star." Stella lived with Mrs Dingley on Ormond Quay, Dublin

Poor Stella must pack off to town

Swift, To Stella at Wood Park (1723)

Steno (Michel), one of the chiefs of the tribunal of Forty. Steno acts indecorously to some of the ladies assembled at a civic banquet given by the doge of Venice, and is turned out of the house. In revenge, he fastens on the doge's chair some scurrilous lines against the young dogaressa, whose extreme modesty and innocence ought to have protected her from such insolence. The doge refers the matter to "the Forty," who sentence Steno to two months' imprisonment. This punishment, in the opinion of Marchese, is wholly inadequate to the crime. And Marino Faliero joins a conspiracy to abolish the council altogether.

Starch, Marino Faliero, the Doge of Venice in state (1819)

Stentor, a Grecean herald in the Trojan war. Homer says he was "great-hearted, brazen-voiced, and could shout as loud as fifty men."

He began to roar for help with the lungs of a Stentor—Smollett

Steph'ano, earl of Carniti, the leader of 400 men in the allied Christian army. He was noted for his military prowess and wise counsel—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, i (1575)

Steph'ano, a drunken butler—Shakespeare, The Tempest (1609).

Steph'ano, servant to Portia—Shal-espeare, Merchant of Venice (1598)

Stephen, one of the attendants of sir Reginald Front de Bœuf (a follower of prince John)—Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.)

Stephen (Count), nephew of the count of Crèvecœur—Sir W Scott, Quentin Durward (time, Edward IV.)

Stephen (Master), a conceited puppy, who thinks all inferiors are to be snubbed and bullied, and all those weaker and more cowardly than himself are to be kicked and beaten. He is especially struck with captain Bobadil, and tries to imitate his "dainty orthis." Master Stephen has no notion of honesty and high-mindedness: thus he steals Down-right's clock, which had been accidentally dropped, declares he bought it, and then that he found it. Being convicted of falsehood, he resigns all claim to it, saying in a huff, "I here, take your clock, I'll none on't." This small-minded youth is young Knowell's cousin—Ben Jonson, Every Man in His Humour (1598)

Stephen (The British St), St Alban, the British proto-martyr (died 303)

As soon as the executioner gave the fatal stroke (which beheaded St Alban), his eyes dropped out of his head—See Feetist's last History (A.D. 34)

Stephen Steelheart, the nickname of Stephen Weatherall—Sir W Scott, Ivanhoe (time, Richard I.)

Stephen of Amboise, leader of 5000 foot soldiers from Blois and Tours in the allied Christian army of Godfrey of Bouillon. Impetuous in attack, but deficient in steady resistance. He was shot by Clorinda with an arrow (bk vi)—Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered (1575)

Sterling (Mr), a vulgar, rich City merchant, who wishes to see his two daughters married to titles. Lord Ogleby calls him "a very abstract of 'Change," and he himself says, "What signifies birth, education, titles, and so forth? Money, I say—money's the stuff that makes a man great in this country."

Mrs Sterling (whose Christian name is Elizabeth or Betty), a spiteful, jealous, purse-proud damsel, engaged to sir John Melvil. Sir John, seeing small prospect of happiness with such a tartar, proposed marriage to the younger sister, and Mrs Sterling being left out in the cold, exclaimed, "Oh that some other person, an earl or duke for instance, would propose to me, that I might be revenged on the monsters!"

Miss Fanny Sterling, an amiable, sweet-smiling, soft-speaking beauty, clandestinely married to Lovewell—Colman and Garrick, The Clandestine Marriage (1766)

A strange blunder was once made by Mrs Gibbs of Corant Garden in the part of "Betty." When speaking of the conduct of Betty who had locked the door of Miss Fanny's room and walk'd away with the key Mrs Gibbs exclaimed "She has locked the key and carried away the door in her pocket."—W C. Russell, Representative Actors

Sterry, a fanatical preacher, admired by Hugh Peters.—S. Butler, Madbras (1663-78)

Stevens, a messenger of the earl of Sussex at Bay's Court—Sir W Scott, Acquithworth (time, Elizabeth)

Stewart (Colonel), governor of the castle of Doune—Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II.)

Stewart (Prince Charles Edward), surnamed "The Chevalier" by his friends, and "The Pretender" by his foes. Sir W Scott introduces him in Waverley, and again in Pedgaurthol, where he appears disguised as "father Buona Ventura" (Now generally spelt Stuart)

Stewart (Walling), John Stewart, the English traveller, who travelled on foot through Hindustan, Persia, Nubia, Abyssinia, the Arabian Desert, Europe, and the United States (died 1822)

A most interesting man, elegant in conversation, containing active and eager beyond all reach of letter. He is sublime and divinely beautiful in his visionariness. This man as a pole-traveler had seen more of the earth's surface than any man before or since.—The Quarterly

* * Walking Stewart must not be confounded with John McDonnell Stuart, the Australian explorer (1818-1866)

Stewart Diamond (The), found in 1872, is the largest South African diamond discovered up to the year 1880. It weighed in the rough state 28½ carats, and but few diamonds in the world exceed it in size. It is of a light yellow hue and is set as a star with eight points and a star above. This superb stone, with the Dudley and Twin Diamonds, have all been discovered in the Cape since 1870

Steyne (Miris off), earl of Gaunt and of Gaunt Castle, a viscount, baron, knight of the Garter and of numerous other orders, colonel, trustee of the British Museum, elder brother of the Trinity House, governor of White France, &c., had beauties and slaves enough to make him a great man, but his life was not a highly moral one, and his conduct with Becky Sharp, when she was the wife of colonel Rawdon Crawley, gave rise to a great scandal. His lordship floated through the ill report, but Mrs Rawdon was obliged to live abroad — W M Thackeray, Vanity Fair (1848)

Stick to it, says Baigent Baigent was the principal witness of the Claimant in the great Tiebhorne trial, and his advice to his protégé was, "Stick to it" (1872)

Stiggins, a hypocritical, drunken, methodist "shepherd" (minister), thought by Mrs Weller to be a saint. His time was spent for the most part in drinking pine-apple rum at the Marquis of Granby tavern — C Dickens, The Pickwick Papers (1836)

WEDDERBURN (the first lord Ashburton) used to place a blister on his chest when he had to make a great speech — Dr Paris, Pharmacologia (1819)

WOOD (Mrs) drank draught porter

Stinkomalee So Theodore Hook called the London University. The word was suggested by "Trineomalee" (in Ceylon), a name before the public at the time Hook hated the "University," because it admitted students of all denominations

Only look at Stinkomalee and King's College. Activity union craft indomitable perseverance on the one side; indolence indelusion internal distrust and jealousies, call like simplicity and cowardice intolerable on the other — Wilson Notes Ambrosiana (1822-36)

Stitch (Tom), a young tailor, a great favourite with the ladies — The Merry History of Tom Stitch (seventeenth century)

Stocks' Market So called from a pair of stocks which at one time stood there. Gardeners used to occupy all but the north and south-west part. The flower called the "stock" received its name from being sold there. The market was removed to Farringdon Street in 1737, and was then called "Fleet Market."

Where is there such a garden in Europe as the Stocks Market? Where such a river as the Thames? Where such ponds and decays as in Leadenhall Market for your fish and fowl?—Shadwell Bury Fair (1629)

Stockwell (Jfr), a City merchant, who promised to give his daughter Nancy in marriage to the son of sir Harry Harlowe of Dorsetshire.

Mrs Stockwell, the merchant's wife, who always veers round to the last speaker, and can be persuaded to anything for the time being.

Nancy Stockwell, daughter of the merchant, in love with Belford, but promised in marriage to sir Harry Harlowe's son. It so happens that sir Harry's son has privately married another lady, and Nancy falls to the man of her choice.—Garrick, Neel or Nothing (1766)

Stolen Kisses, a drama by Paul Meritt, in three acts (1877). Felix Freemantle, under the pseudonym of Mr Joy, falls in love with Cherry, daughter of Tom Spirit once valet to Mr Freemantle (who had come to the title of viscount Trangmar). When Tom Spirit ascertained that "Felix Joy" was the son of the viscount, he forbade all further intercourse, unless Felix produced his father's consent to the marriage. The next part of the plot pertains to the brother of Tom Spirit, who had assumed the name of Walter Temple, and, as a stock-broker, had become very wealthy. In his prosperity, Walter scornfully ignored his brother Tom, and his ambition was to marry his daughter Jenny to the son of viscount Trangmar, who owed him money. Thus the two cousins, Cherry and Jenny, came into collision, but at the end Jenny married Fred Gay, a medical student, Cherry married Felix, the two brothers were reconciled, and Tom released his old master, viscount Trangmar, by destroying the bond which Walter held and gave him.

Stone of Loda, a place of worship amongst the ancient Gaels. — Ossian, Timora, v.

Stonehenge Aurelius Ambrosius asked Merlin what memento he could raise to commemorate his victory over Vortigern, and Merlin advised him to remove "The Giant's Dance" from mount Killaraus, in Ireland, to Salisbury Plain. So Aurelius placed a fleet and 15,000 men under the charge of Uther the pendragon and Merlin for the purpose. Gillomani king of Ireland, who opposed the invaders, was routed, and then Merlin, "by his art," shipped the stones, and set them up on the plain "in the same manner as they stood on Killaraus"—Geoffrey, British History, viii 10-12 (1112).

How Merlin by his skill and magic's wondrous might
From Ireland hither brought the Sonadown in a night
Dryden Polyolbon iv (1612)

Stonehenge once thought a temple you have found
A throne where kings our earthly gods were crowned Dryden Fables ii

Stonehenge a Trophy It is said, in the Welsh trads, that this circle of stones was erected by the Britons to commemorate the "treachery of the Long-Knives," i.e. a conference to which the chief of the British warriors were invited by Hengist at Ambresbury. Beside each chief a Saxon was seated, armed with a long knife, and at a given signal each Saxon slew his Briton. As many as 460 British nobles thus fell, but Eldol earl of Gloucester, after slaying seventy Saxons (some say 660), made his escape.—Welsh Trads See Geoffrey's Brit Hist, bk vi 15.

Stonehenge was erected by Merlin at the command of Ambrosius in memory of the plot of the Long Knives when 300 British chiefs were treacherously massacred by Vortigern. He built it on the site of a former circle. It deviates from older battle circles as may be seen by comparing it with Avebury Stanton Drew Keewick, etc. It is called The Work of Ambrosius.—Cambrian Biography, art. Merddin.

 * * MOUNT DIBU, a solitary mound close to Dumfermline, owes its origin, according to story, to some unfortunate monks, who, by way of penance, carried the sand in baskets from the sea-shore at Inverness.

At Linton is a fine conical hill attributed to two sisters (nuns), who were compelled to pass the whole of the sand through a sieve, by way of penance, to obtain pardon for some crime committed by their brother.

The Gog Magog Hills, near Cambridge, are ascribed to his Satanic majesty.

Stonewall Jackson, Thomas Jonathan Jackson, general in the southern army in the great civil war of the North American States. General Bee suggested the name in the battle of Bull Run (1861). "There is Jackson," said he to his men, "standing like a stone wall" (1826-1863).

Storm (The Great) occurred November 26-7, 1703 This storm supplied Addison with his celebrated simile of the angel

So when an angel by divine command
With rising tempests shakes a guilty land
Such as of late o'er pale Britannia past,
Calm and serene he drives the furious blast
And, pleased to Almight's orders to perform
Bides on the tempest and directs the storm

The Campaign (1705)

Storm-and-Strain Period The last quarter of the eighteenth century was called in Germany the Sturm-und-Drang Zeit, because every one seemed in a fever to shake off the shackles of government, custom, prestige, and religion The poets raved in volcanic rant or moonshine sentimentality, marriage was disregarded, law, both civil and divine, was pooh-poohed Goethe's Man with the Iron Hand and Sorrows of Werther, Schiller's Robbers, Klinger's tragedies, Lessing's criticisms, the mania for Shakespeare and Ossian revolutionized the literature, and the cry went forth for untrammelled freedom, which was nicknamed "Nature" As well go unclad, and call it nature

Storms (Cape of) The Cape of Good Hope was called by Bartholomew Diaz Cabo Tormentoso in 1486, but king John II of Portugal gave it its present more auspicious name

Stornello Verses, verses in which a word or phrase is harped upon, and turned about and about, as in the following example—

Vive in France I wave our banner the red white and blue

The flag of the loyal the royal and true.
Blue and red for our city we wave and the white
For our sovereign the people whose rule is their right.
Royal white loyal blue and forget not the red
To show for our freedom we'll bleed and have life

Stradivarius (Antonius), born at Cremona, in Italy (1670-1728) He was a pupil of Andreas Amati The Amati family, with Stradivarius and his pupil Guarnerius (all of Cremona), were the most noted violin-makers that ever lived, inasmuch that the word "Cremona" is synonymous for a first-rate violin

The instrument on which he played
Was in Cremona's workshops made
The maker from whose hands it came
Had written his unvarnished name—
At only "Stradivarius."

Strafford, an historical tragedy by R Browning (1836) This drama contains portraits of Charles I, the earl of Strafford, Hampden, John Pym, sir Harry Vane, etc., both truthful and graphic Of course, the subject of the drama is the attainder and execution of Wentworth earl of Strafford

Stratlace (Dame Philippa), the maiden aunt of Blushington She is very much surprised to find her nephew entertaining dinner company, and still more so that he is about to take a young wife to keep house for him instead of herself—W T Moncrieff, The Bashful Man

Stral'enheim (Count of), a kinsman of Werner, who hunted him from place to place, with a view of cutting him off, because he stood between him and the inheritance of Siegendorf This mean, plausible, overreaching nobleman was by accident lodged under the same roof with Werner while on his way to Siegendorf Here Werner robbed him of a rouleau of gold, and next night Ulric (Werner's son) murdered him

Ida Stralenheim, daughter of count Stralenheim, betrothed to Ulric, whom she dearly loved, but being told by Ulric that he was the assassin of her father, she fell senseless, and Ulric departed, never to return—Byron, Werner (1822)

The accent of this name is given by Byron sometimes on the first and sometimes on the second syllable

Stralenheim altho noble is unheeded

Act III. 1

The daughter of dead Stralenheim your foe

Act II. 1

Stranger (The), the count Waldbourg He married Adelaide at the age of 16, she had two children by him, and then eloped The count, deserted by his young wife, lived a roving life, known only as "The Stranger," and his wife, repenting of her folly, under the assumed name of Mrs Haller, entered the service of the countess Wintensen, whose affection she secured In three years' time, "the stranger" came by accident into the same neighbourhood, and a reconciliation took place

His servant Francis says he is a good master though one almost loses the use of speech by living with him. A man kind and dear though I cannot understand him. He rails against the whole world and yet no beggar leaves his door unsatisfied. I have now lived three years with him, and yet I know not who he is. A hater of society no doubt. [with] misanthropy in the heart not in the heart.—Benjamin Thompson The Stranger I. 1 (1797)

This drama is altered from Kotzebue.

Mrs R Trench says of John P Kemble (1757-1823)

"I always saw him with pain descend to The Stranger. It was like the genius in the Arabian tale going into the vase. First it seemed so unlikely he should meet with such an affront, and then injured the probability of the piece, and next, The Stranger 'is really never dignified and one is always in pain for him, poor gentleman!—Femina (1802)"

Strangford (Percy Clinton Sydney Smythe, viscount), in 1803, published a translation of the poems of Camoens, the great Portuguese poet

Hibernian Strangford

Byron English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1803)

Strap (Hugh), a simple, generous, and disinterested adherent of Roderick Random. His generosity and fidelity, however, meet with but a base return from the heartless libertine—T Smollett, Roderick Random (1748)

We believe there are few revilers who are not distressed with the miserable reward assigned to Strap in the closing chapter of the novel. Five hundred pounds (secure the value of the goods he had presented to his master) and the hand of a reclamation street walker even when added to a Highland farm seem but a poor recompense for his faithful and disinterested attachment.—Sir W Scott.

Strasbourg Cathedral, designed by Erwin von Steinbach (1015-1139)

Strawberry Leaves (To win the), to be created a duke

Strawberry Preacher (A), a "Jerusalem pony," a temporary help, who wanders from pulpit to pulpit, to preach for some society, to aid some absent or invalid minister, or to advocate some charity. The term was first used by Latimer, and the phrase means a "straying preacher" (Anglo-Saxon, strowcan, "to stray," hence, strawberry, strow-berie, "the straying berry-plant")

Streets of London (The), a drama by Dion Boucicault (1862), adapted from the French play Les Pauvres des Paris

Stre'mon, a soldier, famous for his singing—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Mad Lover (1617)

Strephon, the shepherd in Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, who makes love to the beautiful Urania (1580). It is a stock name for a lover, Cloë being usually the corresponding lady

Captain O Flarty was one of my dying Strephons at Scarborough. I have a very grate regard for him and must make him a little miserable with my happiness.—Garrick, The Irish Widow 1 3 (1757)

The servant of your Strephon is my lord and master—Garrick Miss in Her Teens (1753).

Stretton (Hesha), the pseudonym of Miss Smith, daughter of a bookseller and printer in Wellington, Salop, authoress of several well-known religious novels

Strickalthrow (Merciful), in Cromwell's troop—Sir W Scott, Woodstock (time, Commonwealth)

Strietland (Mr), the "suspicious husband," who suspects Clarinda, a young lady visitor, of corrupting his wife, suspects Jacintha, his ward, of lightness, and suspects his wife of infidelity, but all his suspicions being proved groundless, he promises reform

Mrs Strietland, wife of Mr Strietland, a model of discretion and good nature. She not only gives no cause of jealousy to her husband, but never even resents his suspicions or returns ill temper in the same coin—Dr Hordly, The Suspicious Husband (1747)

Strike Dakyns' the Devil's in the Hempe, the motto of the Dakynses. The reference is to an enemy of the king, who had taken refuge in a pile of hemp. Dakyns, having nosed the traitor, was exhorted to strike him with his battle-axe and kill him, which he did. Hence the crest of the family—a dexter arm holding a battle-axe

Striking the Shield, a call to battle among the ancient Gaels

Strike the sounding shield of Semol! It hangs at Turn's rustling gate. The sound of peace is not its voice. My heroes shall hear and obey. He went. He struck the bossy shield. The hills, the rocks reply. The sound spreads along the wood. Dier start by the lake of rock. It is the shield of war," said Bonnar—Osian Fingal l

BROWN (Miss Phoebe), about five feet six inches in height, well proportioned, round-faced, and ruddy. She could carry fourteen score, and could lift a hundred-weight with each hand at the same time. She was fond of poetry and music, and her chief food was milk.—W. Hutton

MIL of Crotōna could carry on his shoulders a four-year-old bullock, and kill it with a single blow of his fist. On one occasion, the pillar which supported the roof of a house gave way, and Milo held up the whole weight of the building with his hands.

POINTEVILLE, the athlete. He killed a lion with a blow of his fist, and could stop a chariot in full career with one hand.

THOMAS (Thomas) of London (1710-1719). He could lift three hogsheds or 1836 lbs., could heave a horse over a turnpike gate, and could lift two hundredweight with his little finger.

Strongback, one of the seven attendants of Fortunio. He could never be overweighted, and could fell a forest in a few hours without fatigue.—Comtesse D'Aunoy, Fairy Tales ("Fortunio," 1682).

The brothers Grimm have introduced the tale of "Fortunio" in their Goblins.

Strongbow, Gilbert de Clare, who succeeded to the title of his brother, the earl of Hertford, in 1138, and was created earl of Pembroke (died 1149).

Henry II. called him a "false" or "pseudo-earl."

Strongbow (Richard of Strigal) was Richard de Clare earl of Pembroke, son of Gilbert de Clare. He succeeded Dermot king of Leinster, his father-in-law, in 1170, and died 1176.

The earl of Strigal then won Strongbow first that won Wild Ireland with the sword.

Drayton Polyolion xviii. (1613)

Struldrugs, the inhabitants of Luggnagg, who never die.

He had reached that period of life which entitles a man to admission into the ancient order of Struldrugs.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels (Laputa, 1726).

Strutt (Lord), the king of Spain, originally Charles II. (who died without issue), but also applied to his successor Philippe duc d'Anson, called "Philip Lord Strutt."

I need not tell you of the great quarrels that happened in our neighbourhood since the death of the late lord Strutt, how the parson [cardinal Portocarrero] got to settle his estate upon his cousin Philip Baboon to the great disappointment of his cousin squire South [Charles of Austria].—Dr Arbuthnot, History of John Bull i. (1716)

Stryver (Bully), of the King's Bench Bar, counsel for the defence in Darnay's trial.

He was stout, loud, red bluff and free from any drawback of delicacy, had a pushing way of shouldering himself (morally and physically) into companies and conversations that argued well for his shouldering his way on in life.—O. Dickens, A Tale of Two Cities ii. 24 (1859).

Stuart Ill-Fated (The House of), as that of Œdipus.

JAMES I of Scotland, poet, murdered by conspirators at Perth, in the forty-fourth year of his age (1593, 1624-1637).

JAMES II, his son, killed at the siege of Roxburgh, aged 30 (1630, 1637-1640).

JAMES III, his son, was stabbed in his flight from Bannockburn by a pretended priest, aged 36 (1152, 1160-1488).

(His brother, the earl of Mar, was imprisoned in 1177, and died in durance, 1480.)

JAMES IV, his son, the "Chivalrous Madman," was defeated and slain at Flodden, aged 41 (1172, 1488-1513).

JAMES V, his son, was defeated at Solway Moss, November 25, and died of grief, December 14, aged 30 (1512, 1518-1512).

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS, daughter of James V. was beheaded, aged 44 years 63 days (1542, 1542-1587, Old Style).

(Her husband, Henry Stuart lord Darnley, was murdered (1541-1566). Her niece, Arabella Stuart, died insane in the Tower, 1575-1615.)

CHARLES I, her grandson, was beheaded, aged 48 years 69 days (1600, 1625-1649).

CHARLES II, his son, was in exile from 1615 to 1661, and in 1665 occurred the Great Fire of London, in 1666 the Great Plague, died aged 54 years 253 days (1630, 1661-1685).

(His favourite child, a natural son, defeated at Sedgemoor, July 5, was executed as a traitor, July 15, aged 46, 1649-1685).

JAMES II, brother of Charles, and son of Charles I., was obliged to abdicate to save his life, and died in exile (1633, reigned 1685-1688, died a pensioner of Louis XIV., 1701).

JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD "the Luckless," his son, called the "Old Pretender," was a mere cipher. His son Charles came to England to proclaim him king, but was defeated at Culloden, leaving 3000 dead on the field (1688-1765).

CHARLES EDWARD, the "Young Pretender," was son of the "Old Pretender."

After the defeat at Calloden he fled to France, was banished from that kingdom, and died at Rome a drunken dotard (1720-1788)

HENRY BENEDICT, cardinal York, the last of the race, was a pensioner of George III

Stuart of Italy (The Mary), Jane I of Naples (1327, 1343-1382)

Jane married her cousin Andre of Hungary, who was assassinated two years after his marriage, when the widow married the assassin. So Mary Stuart married her cousin lord Darnley, 1567, who was murdered 1567, and the widow married Bothwell, the assassin

Jane fled to Provence, 1347, and was strangled in 1382. So Mary Stuart fled to England in 1568, and was put to death 1587 (Old Style)

Jane, like Mary, was remarkable for her great beauty, her brilliant court, her voluptuousness, and the men of genius she drew around her, but Jane, like Mary, was also noted for her deplorable administration

* La Harpe wrote a tragedy called Jeanne d'Naples (1765). Schiller has an adaptation of it (1821)

Stuarts' Fatal Number (The) This number is 88

James III was killed in flight near Bannockburn, 1488

Mary Stuart was beheaded 1688 (New Style)

James II of England was dethroned 1688

Charles Edward died 1788

 James Stuart, the "Old Pretender," was born 1688, the very year that his father abdicated

James Stuart, the famous architect, died 1788

(Some affirm that Robert II, the first Stuart king, died 1388, the year of the great battle of Otterburn, but the death of this king is more usually fixed in the spring of 1390)

Stubble (Reuben), bailiff to Farmer Cornflower, rough in manner, severe in discipline, a stickler for duty, "a plain, upright, and downright man," true to his master and to himself — C Dibdin, The Farmer's Wife (1780)

Stubbs (Miss Sissy or Cicilia) daughter of squire Stubbs, one of Waverley's neighbours — Sir W Scott, Waverley (time, George II)

Stuffy (Matthew), an applicant to Velinspeck, a country manager, for a situation as prompter, for which he says he is peculiarly qualified by that affection of the eyes vulgarly called a squint, which enables him to keep one eye on the performers and the other on the book at the same time — Charles Mathews, At Home (1818)

Stuffy is one of the richest bits of humour we ever witnessed. His endless allusions upon the state of things in the immortal Garrick's time are highly ludicrous. — Contemporary Paper

Stuke'ly (2 syl), a detectable man. "I would be as easy to mal e him honest as bra e" (act 1 2). He pretends to be the friend of Beverley, but cheats him. He aspires to the hand of Miss Beverley, who is in love with Lewson — Edward Moore, The Gamester (1753)

Stuldy (Will), the companion of Little John. In the morris-dance on May-day, Little John used to occupy the right hand side of Robin Hood, and Will Stukely the left (See STUTLY)

Stupid Boy (The), St Thomas Aquinas, also called at school "The Dumb Ox" (1224-1274)

Sturgeon (Major), J P, "the fishmonger from Brentford," who turned volunteer. This bragging major makes love to Mrs Jerry Sneak — S Loe, The Mayor of Garratt (1763)

We had some desperate duty sir Jacob. Each marchings and counter marchings from Brentford to Ealing, from Ealing to Acton, from Acton to Uxbridge. Why, there was our last expedition to Hounslow. That day's work carried off major Molochus. But to proceed. On we marched the men all in high spirits to attack the gibb t where Ganiel is hanging. But winding down a narrow lane to the left as it might be about there in order to possess a plattice that we might take the gallons in flank, and secure a retreat who should come by but a drove of fat oxen for Smithfield. The drums beat in front, the dogs barked in the rear, the oxen set up a gallop, on they came thundering upon us, broke through our ranks in an instant, and threw the whole corps into confusion. — Act I 1

Sturmthal (Melchor), the banneret of Berne, one of the Swiss deputies — Sir W Scott, Anne of Geierstein (time, Edward IV)

Stutly (Will), sometimes called Will Stulchy, a companion of Little John. In the morris-dance on May-day Little John occupied the right hand side of Robin Hood, and Will Stutly the left. His rescue from the sheriff of [Notts] by

Robin Hood, forms the subject of one of the Robin Hood ballads

When Robin Hood in the greenwood lived,
Under the greenwood tree,
Tidings there came to him with speed,
Tidings for certaintie
That Will Stutly surprized was
And ake in prison lay
Three varlets that the sheriff hired
Did likely him betray

Styx, one of the five rivers of hell The others are Ach'eron ("the river of grief"), Cocytus ("the river of wailing"), Phleg'ethon ("the river of liquid fire"), and Let'hē ("the river of oblivion") Styx means "the river of hate" (Greek, stugeo, "I hate")

Abhorred Styx, the flood of deadly hate
And Ach'eron of sorrow black and deep
Cocytus, named of lamentation loud
Heard on the rueful stream fierce Phleg'ethon
With hoarse waves of torrent fire inflame with rage
Far off from these a slow and silent stream
Let'hē the river of oblivion rolls

Milton, Paradise Lost ii. 577 etc. (1665)

* * Dantē places the rivers in different circles of the Inferno, thus, he makes the Ach'eron divide the border-land from limbo The former realm is for the "pruseless and the blameless dead," limbo is for the unbaptized He places the Stygian Lake of "inky hue" in the fifth circle, the realm of those who put no restraint on their anger The fire-stream of Phleg'ethon he fixes to the eighth steep, the "hell of burning where it snows flakes of fire," and where blasphemers are confined He places "the frozen river" of Cocytus in the tenth pit of Mal'bolge, a region of thick-ribbed ice, the lowest depth of hell, where Judas and Lucifer are imprisoned Let'hē, he says, is no river of hell at all, but it is the one wish of all the infernals to get to it, that they may drink its water and forget their torments, being, however, in "Purgatory," they can never get near it — The Divine Comedy (1300-11)

Subtle, the "alchemist," an artful quack, who pretends to be on the eve of

Suerpo Santo, called St Lino, Castor and Pollux, St Hermes, a comazant or electric light occasionally seen on a ship's mast before or after a storm

I do remember there came upon the tops of our maine yante and maine maie a certaine little light which the Spaniards call the Suerpo Santo This light continued aboard our ship about three hours flying from maie to maie and from top to top—Hicklyt, Teyngnet (17.6).

Suffusion So that dimness of sight is called which precedes a cataract It was once thought that a cataract was a thin film growing externally over the eye and veiling the sight, but it is now known that the seat of the disease is the crystalline humour (between the outer coat of the eye and the pupilla) Couching for this disease is performed with a needle, which is passed through the external coat, and driven into the crystalline humour (See DICIONARY)

So thick a drop serene hath quenched their orbs
Or dim suffusion veiled

Milton Paradise Lost III. 24 (1635)

Suicides from Books

CROMBROTOS, the Academic philosopher, killed himself after reading Plato's Phædon, that he might enjoy the happiness of the future life so enchantingly described

FRAULFIN VON LASSBERG drowned herself in spleen, after reading Goethe's Sorrows of Werther

Sun on Easter Day It was at one time maintained that the sun danced on Easter Day

But oh! she dances such a way,

No sun upon an Easter Day

Is half so fine a sight.

Sir John Suckling, The Wedding (died 1641)

Whose beauty makes the sprightly sun

To dance as upon Easter Day

John Cleveland The General Eclipse (died 1653)

Sunday is the day when witches do penance

Fill on a day (that day is every prime [first day])

When witches wot do penance for their crime.

Spenser Faery Queen l. ii. 40 (1590)

Sunflower (The) is so called simply because the flower resembles a picture-sun, with its yellow petals like rays round its dark disc. Thomas Moore is quite in error when he says it turns towards the sun. I have had sunflowers turning to every point of the compass, and after narrowly watching them, have seen in them no tendency to turn towards the sun, or to shift their direction.

The sunflower turns on her god when he sets,

The same look which she turned when he rose
